TOUSSAINT LOUVERTURE.

THE AFRICAN HERO, &c.

EVERY body has heard of TOUSSAINT, the famous Negro General. Who does not know that it was he who fought so bravely for the freedom of the poor blacks of St. Domingo, and who also defended the island for France during the whole of the last war. In this, by the by, he did no more than his duty as a Frenchman; and every loyal Englishman will like him the better for it. He has been basely requited for all his services by that same slavish republic; but what of that! Had he played the traitor he would not have fared better in the end, and he would in that case have lost his honour; and his brave followers, perhaps, their freedom; both which are now out of danger. I hope too, we all are Christians enough to believe that it makes a mighty difference to him now he is dead and gone, that he was found faithful in the great duties to which it pleased God to call him.

Well! we have all heard, as I was saying, of Toussaint's feats in the last war; but it is not so well known how good a man he was, and what has happened to him and his brave islanders since; and I am resolved to give some account of both; aye, and to tell some home truths too about that wicked business, the murder of this great and good man, let the Consul take it how he may.

I thank God, Englishmen may still dare to tell the truth, though Buonaparte takes care that Frenchmen shall not hear it. What! are he and his ruffians to stab and drown all the poor labourers of St. Domingo because they chuse to work as men for wages, and not like horses under the driver's lash; and must Englishmen be kept in the dark about it, forsooth, for fear that his mightiness should be angry? No, this foul business shall out in spite of him. It shall be seen as plain as I can make it, who are the true friends of the common people, and who are not; for I can never for my part believe that they who hate, oppress, and murder the labouring poor in one part of the world, can really wish to make them free and happy in another.

But I must come to the point, for I have a long story to tell, and wish it to be read by honest hard-working men, who cannot afford much time to books, especially now when their help may be wanting to keep the man-whip out of England*.

* In the West Indies this is called the cart-whip; the cart-horses and labourers being driven in the same way. Buonaparte might, perhaps, take a fancy to use this method in England, at least in the summer; for one of his hired authors has actually written a book to prove that this is the only way to make men work in hot climates†.

I cannot tell for certain where Toussaint was born, and I am resolved to put down nothing for truth that I am not sure of. Some say he was born in St. Domingo, and by birth a slave, others that he came from Africa; and if so he was born free; for there are no slaves in that country, but what are made such for the purpose of being sold to traders. I incline to think the honour of giving birth to this great man belongs to St. Domingo, but will not stop to give my reasons, as the point is not of much consequence; it is agreed on all hands, that he was in a state of slavery, and that he owed his freedom to the revolution, which took place in that island in the year 1791.

We have no distinct account of the conduct of Toussaint while a slave, but may safely conclude that he was sober, honest, humble, and industrious, because it is certain that he was a favourite with his master, which without possessing those good qualities, especially the two latter, in a high degree, no slave could possibly become. It is also pretty certain that he was a good husband, and a good father; for it appears that he had, contrary to the general bad manners of that country, early joined himself to one woman, by whom he had several children, the objects of his tender affection; and we shall find that the mother continued to live with him when they had both become elderly folks, and to share with him all the dangers and hardships of war, down to the time when he fell into the hands of his treacherous and bloody enemies, and was sent to perish in one of Buonaparte's dungeons.

Toussaint, by the uncommon kindness of his master, or as some say, by his own unassisted pains, learned to read and write; and it appears from his letters and other writings, as well as from his wise conduct, that he made good use of these talents. He probably owed to them in good measure the power which he afterwards obtained over the minds of his poor ignorant countrymen; and this, when we find to what good purposes he used his power, will seem an instance of God's gracious providence; for not one Negro slave in ten thousand has the same advantage.

This great man was also prepared for public life by a good quality more important than all others put together: he was a devout man, and a sincere disciple of Christ. He was a Roman Catholic, it is true, but he knew no better faith; and he that serves God to the best of his knowledge, will not be rejected for not knowing what he was never taught.

His vile oppressors have called this good man's religion hypocrisy; but it is not to certain folks who make themselves Mahometans in Turkish countries; that we shall come for the characters of Christians. They were bound to revile his noble heart before they basely destroyed him, and they had no course left to take with his known piety, but to give it that odious name. Toussaint had nothing to gain but the favour of God by openly giving him glory; for his Negroes had been taught little religion, and the people of France who had sided with them, were for the most part sworn foes to Christianity.

Though

Though we do not know much, as I was saying, of Toussaint's private life before the war, I suppose it was spent in a pious, as well as a moral way. It is not likely that he became religious all at once when he became a soldier. He worshipped God no doubt in private, and in church when able to go there; and as he added to faith, uprightness, and purity of life, he was chosen by Providence to be a leader and deliverer of his brethren. "Him who honours me," says the Almighty, "I will honour."

It is happy for any people when such persons are raised to public stations. In every place the true staunch friends of liberty, and of the poor, must be sought for among those who fear God.

Toussaint had certainly passed the age of forty, and was probably at least forty-eight, when the great change, called a revolution, took place in St. Domingo. Every one knows that much bloodshed attended that change. The white people first provoked a quarrel with the Mulattoes and free-blacks, and in a bloody civil war that followed between those parties, the slaves threw off the yoke of private bondage.

It is no part of my plan to write the history of the revolution in St. Domingo, or of the wars that followed it. Neither I nor my readers have time for those wide subjects, and I am not sorry for it. For my part, I had rather not speak or hear of bloody and wicked actions unless when something good is to be learnt from them; and I know nothing that is to be learnt from the civil wars of St. Domingo, but what every well-informed man knows already; I mean the dreadful effects of West India slavery upon the minds both of the master and the slave. I will only observe, that if these wars were carried on in a very barbarous way, the White French were not an inch behind the Blacks in cruelty; and what is more, first set them the example of it. It is enough to set an Englishman's hair on end to hear of the horrid manner in which those White Savages put their prisoners to death at the beginning of the war, though even the French ladies looked on with satisfaction*.

* It would swell this little book to a bulk too large and too costly, were I in general to give quotations in proof of the facts related; but a charge like this seems to call for an authority; I therefore cite as an instance of such cruelty, an account given by an eye witness, the late Mr. Bryan Edwards.

"Two of these unhappy men suffered in this manner under the window of the author's lodgings, at Cape François, on the 28th of Sept. 1791." The author then describes the breaking of two negroes alive upon the wheel; the French mob would not suffer the executioner to put the tortured wretches out of their pain as usual, by a blow upon the stomach; but after he had shewn that mercy to the first, forced him to stop when he was proceeding to dispatch the second. "The miserable wretch with his broken limbs doubled up, was put on a cart wheel, &c. At the end of forty minutes, some English seamen who were spectators of the tragedy, strangled him in mercy. As to all the French spectators (many of them persons of fashion, who beheld the scene from the windows of their upper apartments) it grieves me to say, that they looked on with the most perfect composure and sang froid. Some of the ladies, as I was told, even ridiculed with a great deal of unseemly mirth, the sympathy shewn by the English at the sufferings of the wretched criminals."—Edwards's Hist. of St. Domingo, chap. 6. Note on page 78.

The bitterest enemies of Toussaint have confessed that he had no share in these crimes. He had just as much to do with them as the firemen who bring up the engine have with the crime of the villains who set fire to the house. This has never been denied by his enemies; and to shew you how clear our Hero's innocence is, I will here quote the words of an author who is one of his bitterest defamers. Monsieur DUBROCA, who was employed by the French government to slander poor Toussaint in a libel called his life, published at Paris while they were publishing rewards for his head at St. Domingo, thus writes: "Far from taking any part in the movements that preceded the insurrection of the Negroes, he seemed determined to keep aloof from all the intrigue and violence of the times; and certain it is, that history has not to reproach him with taking any share in the massacre of the White People in August 1791*." This unwilling justice ought to have been extended to the whole term of the wars in which he afterwards engaged, during which not a single act of cruelty can be truly alledged against him.

Toussaint first rose to notice when the fury of the struggle between master and slave was over, just as you have seen the sun rise after a stormy night; and his first labours were to protect the White people who were now in their turn the feeble and oppressed party, from the revenge of his brethren. During the first troubles of the Island, our Hero appears to have remained quietly at home in his master's service. Perhaps he expected a peaceable change of the state of his brethren from the French Convention; or perhaps he was too pious and humane to join in the means by which the rest broke the galling chains of their private bondage, though he might see no other way of deliverance. Certain it is, that he was no enemy to the grand cause of general freedom, as might be proved, not only from the great sacrifices he has since made to it, but from the confidence that was soon after reposed in him by the Negroes at large. It is probable that he was led to remain so long inactive in the war, not only from the mildness and piety of his disposition, but from affection and gratitude to his master, and that these motives being generally known, helped, as virtue will always do in the main, to gain him confidence and support when he entered on public life.

By the word master you are not here to understand his owner, who, as usual with West India planters, lived in Europe; but the Overseer or Bailiff of the Estate, whose name I think was Bayou de Libertas. By this gentleman he was treated as I have said, with kindness, and was, a little before the time we are speaking of, raised to a post of no small dignity. My readers may be inclined to smile, but I can assure them that field Negroes would have no feeling less serious than envy, on hearing that Toussaint was actually promoted to the place of postillion. That he was raised to this dignity instead of a more common preferment among slaves, I impute to his disposition; for Toussaint seems to have been fitter in point of temper to drive light worked horses, than hard worked men. Horses in the West Indies are by no means driven too hard, or fed too little. Toussaint therefore found this kind of driving not contrary to his feelings, and the steward of M. de Noe was I doubt not driven to his mind, by the future leader of armies, the founder perhaps of a new empire, and the conqueror of the conquerors of Europe.

We see then that Toussaint had a place to lose by joining the opposition; yet I verily believe that it was conscience, and not interest, that kept him at this period from throwing off the placeman, and putting on the patriot. His presence and his influence were doubtless the means of preserving the estate he lived upon from the destruction in which so many others were at this time involved, and of saving the life of his master.

On our Hero's first rising to power among the Negroes, he gave to this master one very pleasing earnest of his future character, which it would be wrong to pass over in silence. The White People, especially the planters, were so odious, both from their former tyranny, and the blood they had cruelly shed in the struggle to preserve their power, that the Negroes, when they got the upper hand, were disposed to give them no quarter; and happy was the man among them who could make his escape from the island, though it were to go with his family penniless into a foreign country. The late master of Toussaint, now his master no more, was one of the unfortunate planters, who, not having escaped in good time, was on the point of falling into the hands of the enraged Negroes, and would in that event certainly have been put to death. But his former kindness to Toussaint was not forgotten. Our Hero, at the great risk of bringing the vengeance of the multitude on his own head, delivered his unhappy master privately out of their hands, and sent him on board a ship bound for America, then lying in the harbour. Nor was this all—he was not sent away empty—for this brave and generous Negro found means to put on board secretly for his use a great many hogsheads of sugar, in order to support him in his exile, till the same grateful hands should be able to send him a larger supply.

Let this story redden the cheeks of those who are wicked and foolish enough to say, that Negroes have no gratitude. Small is the debt of gratitude which their best treatment under the iron yoke of West India slavery can create. But a noble mind will not haggle with the claims of gratitude or mercy. Toussaint looked less at the wrong of keeping him in a brutal slavery, than to the kindness which had lightened his chain, and M. Layou was happy enough to find in a freed Negro a higher pitch of virtue than is often to be found among the natives of Europe.

This great man was not long in public life before he became the chief leader of the Blacks. In their war with the planters they had many other generals, and some of great note, such as Biassou, Boukman, and Jean François, all Negroes, and very brave brave ones. These were famous before Toussaint's name was heard of, but he soon put them all down; not in the French way, by cutting their heads off, or sending them prisoners to a distant and pestilent country, but as a tall stately tree puts down the weeds and brushwood in its growth, by fairly rising above, and casting a shadow over them. He soon found no equal, without having once destroyed a superior or a rival.

Toussaint seems to have got up by degrees till he came to the top by the growing love and esteem of the people, founded on his good qualities, which unfolded themselves more and more as his power encreased. He might, in this respect, furnish an useful lesson to the great men of every country, aye, and to the people too; for Toussaint, as we shall find, proved himself to be the most firm and undaunted friend of freedom; and as never any people had so valuable a common cause to defend as the Negroes of St. Domingo, so never did any public cause find a more faithful champion; and yet I doubt not that even Toussaint's virtues seemed to make against him at first; for he did not flatter the common people, or encourage them in their crimes, like Boukman, Biassou, and the rest.

These chiefs, who were always urging them to revenge and slaughter, and telling them perhaps that their freedom was in danger as long as a White Man was suffered to live in the Island, appeared at first to be their truest friends; but Toussaint, who was always trying to teach them mercy, industry, and order, was found in the long run to be the man they could best depend upon; and happy had it been for them had they always followed his councils.

This great man had uncommon gifts both of body and mind: I will mention some of them, and that I may be sure to do him no more than justice, they shall be taken mostly from the words of his enemies.

Let us hear, for instance, the evidence of one of Buonaparte's hireling writers before quoted, as having published a vile and absurd book to defame our Hero in Paris, while the Consul was trying to hunt him down in St. Domingo. Mark how much malice itself is obliged to confess in his favor.

"This celebrated Negro is of the middle stature; he has a fine eye, and his glances are rapid and penetrating; extremely sober by habit; his activity in the prosecution of his enterprises is incessant. He is an excellent horseman, and travels on occasion, with inconceivable rapidity, arriving frequently at the end of his journey alone, or almost unattended; his aid-de-camps and his domestics being unable to follow him in journeys, which are often of 50 or 60 leagues. He sleeps generally in his clothes, and gives very little time either to repose or to his meals. All his actions are covered with such a profound veil of hypocrisy, that all who approach him are betrayed into an opinion of the purity of his intentions." "The Marquis d'Hermona, that intelligent and distinguished Spanish officer, (who had served with our Hero, and knew him intimately) said of him: "*If a HEAVENLY BEING * were to* descend upon earth, he could not inhabit a heart more apparently good than that of Toussaint Louverture."

* The expression in the original is much stronger, but it savours too much of French impiety to be quoted.

I do not copy the abuse that is mixed up with this praise, nor the idle and absurd changes brought against him by the same writer*. We must not stop to answer the slanderers of Toussaint, for we shall scarcely have time enough even for the best and shortest answer to them,—the record of his noble actions. The same libeller acknowledges, that in appearance at least, piety is a ruling feature in the character of Toussaint. He reproaches him with being always attended by priests, and having had no less than three confessors. I wish France had no worse priests than those who shared with this good chief all the perils and hardships of war on the mountains of St. Domingo, in order that they might soften and mend the characters of a new people by the powerful influence of religion. The French bishops themselves would, in my mind, be better employed in such hard service, than in composing impious flattery for the Consul.

But Toussaint's religion the French Atheists tell us was all hypocrisy; so were his humanity, his moderation, his loyalty to the king, and afterwards, when the Convention had decreed freedom to his race, his fidelity to the Republic! Nay his zeal for the cause of liberty itself was all merely pretence and hypocrisy!

Do you ask for proofs of this charge? Why you have all the proofs that the great nation has at this moment of the baseness and wickedness of England! You have the sacred word of the Chief Consul; and if you doubt of that, it is well for you he is still on the other side of the straits of Dover; the doubt might else cost you a dungeon for life.

The strange vileness of Toussaint's hypocrisy consisted in this, that he all along was good in deeds, as well as words; and as that is the only kind of hypocrisy that Buonaparte never practised, he is very angry at it in others. It is to be sure extremely provoking, because when a man will, from mere hypocrisy, act well and nobly as Toussaint did, to the end of his life, there is no way for an enemy and a rival to prove the guilt against him. So deep was Toussaint's hypocrisy, that the great Consul himself, though a messenger from Heaven, "sent upon earth to restore order, equality, and justice," was grossly deceived by him; for he gave the highest praises to our Hero down to the very day of setting a price upon his head, and only found out his hypocrisy when resolved upon putting him to death. The truth is, that of all the many virtues of our Hero, his probity was the most distinguished. It was quite a proverb among our own officers who long carried on war against him, and among the white inhabitants of St. Domingo, that Toussaint never broke his word.

There cannot be a better proof that he possessed and deserved this fame, than the reliance which was placed on his promises in the nicest cases by those who knew him best, and to whom his falsehood would have been fatal; and it is a notorious fact, that the exiled French planters and merchants did not scruple to return from North America and their other places of refuge, on receiving his promise to protect them. It is equally well known, that not one of them ever found cause in his conduct to repent of such confidence.

Here I must beg leave to tell a short story, which will serve to shew how far Toussaint respected the principle of good faith, and with how good a grace the French Government can question his probity.

It is well known that he entered into a treaty with General Maitland, the British Commander in Chief, by which the island was to be evacuated by our troops, and was to remain neutral to the end of the war. On this occasion he came to see General Maitland at his head quarters, and the General, wishing to settle some points personally with him before our troops should embark, returned the visit at Toussaint's camp in the country.

So well was his character known, that the British General did not scruple to go to him with only two or three attendants, though it was at a considerable distance from his own army, and he had to pass through a country full of Negroes, who had very lately been his mortal enemies. The Commissioner of the French Republic, however, did not think so well of the honor of this virtuous Chief. It is very natural for wicked men to think badly of mankind, and most Frenchmen of the present day, not only suppose every man will be bloody and treacherous when worth his while, but I really believe would hold him cheap if found of an opposite cast.

With such notions and feelings, Monsieur Roume the French Commissioner thought this visit of General Maitland a fine opportunity to make him prisoner; what does he do therefore, but writes a letter to Toussaint, begging him of all things as he was a true Republican, to seize the British General's person. Well, General Maitland proceeds towards Toussaint's camp. On the road he received a letter from one of his private friends, telling him of Monsieur Roume's plot, and warning him not to put himself into the Negro General's power; but the known character of Toussaint made the British General still rely upon his honor: besides the good of his Majesty's service required at that period, that confidence should be placed in this great man, though even at some risk; and General Maitland therefore bravely and wisely determined to go on.

When they arrived at Toussaint's head quarters, he was not to be seen. Our General was desired to wait, and after much delay the Negro Chief still did not appear. General Maitland's mind began to misgive him, as was natural upon a reception seemingly so uncivil, and so much falling in with the warning he had received. But at length out comes Toussaint with two letters open in his hand: "There, General, (said the upright Chief) read these before we talk together; the one is a letter just received from Roume, and the other my answer. I would not come to you, till I had written my answer to him; that you may see how safe you are with me, and how incapable I am of baseness." General Maitland read the letters, and found found the one an artful attempt to excite Toussaint to seize his guest, as an act of duty to the Republic ; the other a noble and indignant refusal. " What," said Toussaint, " have I " not passed my word to the British General? How then " can you suppose that I will cover myself with dishonor by " breaking it? His reliance on my good faith leads him to " put himself in my power, and I should be for ever infamous " were I to act as you advise. I am faithfully devoted to the " Republic, but will not serve it at the expense of my con- " science, and my honor."

It is not strange that with such virtues and such talents our Hero should win the hearts of the Negroes, and soon become their favourite leader. He did so to such a degree, that their first famous chiefs were soon forgot ; and except Rigaud, a brave and active Mulatto, leader in the South of the island, we afterwards heard nothing of any General of the Blacks but Toussaint Louverture. Rigaud was also a very able man ; but not so honest an one as Toussaint : he however pretended to be a much more zealous friend of freedom than the other leaders ; and distinguished himself by his rage against the planters and the English. By the dint of his violence, he passed for a fast friend of the cause, and long kept himself at the head of a large party, whom he persuaded that Toussaint was not so trust-worthy as himself ; but he was at last forced to yield to that great man's superior merit, and was driven from the island, because while there he was continually disturbing the public peace.

When Toussaint first rose to power, the contest between the Blacks and their former owners was ended, and the French Commissioners, who then attempted to govern the Island, were fain to acknowledge the freedom of the Negroes, and promise to maintain it. But another civil war arose, and was carried on with great fury between the party of the dethroned French King, and that of the Convention. In this the Negroes, as well as the White People, took different sides among themselves, and were perhaps pretty equally divided.

Toussaint, who knew that his brethren owed the Convention no thanks for their freedom, was naturally found on the same side with loyalty, generosity, and religion, and by the aid of his courage and talents, the cause of royalty was soon as triumphant in St. Domingo as it had proved unsuccessful in Europe. For his great services in this war, he received from the King of Spain a commission as General in his Army, and had the honor of being admitted a Knight of the Ancient Military Orders of that Country ; so at least his enemies assert.

But events arose which made it impossible for Toussaint, as a wise man and a true patriot, longer to stand out against the existing government of France. The cause of royalty having failed in that country, little could be done to serve the royal family by prolonging the miseries of civil war in a West India island, while the great stake of Negro liberty might be lost by further opposition to the parent state. It was probably a deciding consideration with our Hero, that the Planters and Loyalists of St. Domingo, with whom he was now allied, began began openly to intrigue for the assistance of Great Britain, and to invite us to invade the Island; for their object, however friendly to French Royalty, was certainly adverse to Negro freedom; and it was less for the sake of restoring the sceptre of France to the Bourbons, than for that of recovering the iron sceptres of their own Plantations, that most of these gentry desired to have the British flag flying at St. Domingo—they were stanch royalists then for the same reason that makes them now fast friends to a Corsican Usurper. Toussaint knew this, and saw that he must either shake hands with the French Commissioners, or engage himself on the same side with foreign invaders, and with Frenchmen who were sworn foes to the liberty of his race.

For these and other reasons he found it necessary to give peace to the republican party whom he had already conquered, and to acknowledge the authority of the Convention.

From this time he was a faithful servant of France during every change in its government, though often troubled and hindered in his plans for the public good by the folly and wickedness of that country.

The Committees, Directors, and other successive Rulers of France from time to time, sent Commissioners to the island; and these gentry were as fond of plunder in the West Indies, as their masters were in Europe. Like them they croaked over a public criminal like carrion crows over a dead horse; and every man who had property to forfeit, was sure to be cried down as a traitor. But happily their white faces in St. Domingo, exposed their black hearts to much suspicion, and with such a mind to check them as that of the generous Toussaint, made them for the most part as harmless, as vipers deprived of their fangs. This great man conducted himself with so much prudence, as without giving offence to the French Government, to make its Commissioners mere cyphers. He let nobody wrong or insult them, and obliged every one to treat their office with respect, and yet left them no power, because he found they would only use it for purposes of cruelty and mischief. He protected the planters from the Commissioners, and both from the natural jealousy of the Negroes.

The French Government more than once recalled its Commissioners, and sent out new ones; but the case was still the same. There were among them very able men, but Toussaint was an overmatch for them all. They were obliged to leave in his abler hands all the actual power, and to lean on him for protection.

More than once his power and credit with the Negroes saved these men from destruction. General Laveaux in particular once clearly owed his life to our Hero, and publicly acknowledged the debt; Laveaux was at that time commander in chief for France, and the Negroes of Cape François, suspecting him of a plot against their freedom, rose against him, threw him into prison, and were preparing to put him to death, when Toussaint with a band of faithful followers marched into the town and delivered him out of their hands. General Laveaux was on this occasion so struck with the conduct and talents of Toussaint, that he did not scruple to declare, in a public letter, his resolution to take no measure in future in the government of the island without that great man's advice and consent.

The French government could not but see that its authority in the colony depended wholly on the will of this noble African, yet was long foolish enough to attempt to govern there by other agents, till at length, in March 1797, they sent him a commission declaring him general in chief of the armies of St. Domingo. This commission he held under the express confirmation of Buonaparte, till Leclerc, fatally for France and for himself, was sent out to supersede and betray this faithful servant of the republic.

It was a great mercy to many unfortunate white people who remained on the island, that a man like Toussaint possessed the chief power. He protected them from being massacred, and restored them to the property of which they had been deprived. When he found himself strong enough, and so well known to his followers as not to be afraid of slander, he even invited the banished planters to return from America, and other places to which they had fled for refuge; and such of them as returned, were restored by him to their estates.

There was one kind of property, however, for which our Hero had no respect; and that was the property of human flesh and blood. He thought that except what we owe to our God, our country, and our relations, every man ought to belong to himself. He thought it not amiss too, that there should be some distinction between a labouring man and a horse, and in this, though the great Buonaparte is of a different way of thinking, I cannot help being of opinion, that Toussaint was not altogether in the wrong. When I say therefore that the planters were restored to their estates, it must not be understood, that they were allowed to drive and sell their Negroes as formerly.

Neither did the Negro Chief think it reasonable, that the masters should work their poor labourers as much, whip them as much, and feed them as little as they thought fit. Here again there has been a wide difference between him and the Chief Consul; and these differences have cost Toussaint his life, and France the island of St. Domingo.

Our Hero however acted up to these odd notions of his, and therefore obliged the planters to put such of their former slaves as chose to work for them on the footing of hired servants.

And here I must notice the greatest difficulty which our Hero had to struggle with, in his labours for the public good. Did you ever know a poor lad who had been snubbed and beat a great deal at school by a crabbed old schoolmaster? If you did, I will answer for it you never found the boy fond of his book; and still less of going back to school after the holidays. For a like reason (among others which it would be tedious to mention) Toussaint did not find the Negroes over and above fond of going back to work on the plantations.

He laboured with all his might to remove this difficulty, and to restore the tillage of the soil, upon which, under God, he knew that the happiness of every country chiefly depends. To this this end he encouraged the labourers by giving them a third part of the crops for their wages; and this you know was a great deal, in a country where sugar and coffee are the chief productions. He also made laws to restrain idleness, and oblige people to labour upon fair terms for their own livelihood, and to enforce these laws, he made use of his power as a General.

Some folks have found fault with him, because he did not employ the civil power for this purpose instead of the military; but in truth he had no civil power to employ. People in this happy land are apt to forget, that laws and magistrates and courts of justice, all exactly fitted to produce peace order and public happiness, with the utmost possible regard to the liberty of the subject, are blessings that grow with the oak, and not with the mushroom. Human wisdom can no more make them on a sudden, or renew them in a moment when madly destroyed, than it can raise a tall tree in a single night from an acorn. As to Toussaint and his Negroes, they had every thing which belongs to civil life to learn. In their former state they could know nothing of it; for a slave has no country; the breath of his master is his law, and the overseer is both judge and jury: the driver is both constable and beadle, as well as carman to the human cattle. During the war there was no place for any but military institutions; and Toussaint therefore when it was necessary to enforce laws for the public good, had no justices of peace but his captains, or parish officers but his soldiers, to apply to.

It is true that for these reasons he was obliged so far to disgrace the idle and disorderly Negroes, as to put them upon the same footing with the present free French Republicans. The only difference between his government in this respect and Buonaparte's, was, that Toussaint had no dungeons, no sickly deserts of exile; no, nor any injustice or oppression. He put the idle vagrant, and the deserter upon the same footing, and they were equally liable to be punished after a fair trial by a court martial; but so mild were his punishments, that the severest one for a labourer was, the being obliged to enlist as a soldier.

There is one great branch of Toussaint's services to France upon which an Englishman cannot like to enlarge. It is too well known what great pains we long took during the last war to conquer St. Domingo. How much money, as well as how many valuable lives the attempt cost us, is more than I wish or am able to tell. There is nothing in the conduct of our brave soldiers in that field, but what does them honour; yet I chuse to be silent as to that unhappy attempt, and shall only say that Toussaint, through the whole of the long contest with our army, acted so as to win the admiration of his enemies as well as the praise of his ungrateful country.

Here I shall beg leave again to quote from the words of the Consul's champion, Dubrocá. "His conduct during the war with the English was brilliant and without stain, and that epoch of his life would be truly great if the services he rendered the republic at that time had not been like all that preceded, subservient to his own ambition." That a defender of the Consul
durst

durst venture to speak of ambition as a crime is strange, but perhaps the only guilty ambition in Buonaparte's judgment, is that which aims to promote the liberty and happiness of our countrymen.

I pass to the evacuation of the towns and forts of the island by his Majesty's troops. Here the French assassins of Toussaint make their chief stand against him. "He suffered the English to escape, say they, on too easy terms, and his conduct upon this occasion was treachery to the republic."

It is strange, methinks, that Toussaint's treachery was not found out in France a little sooner; for certainly the terms of the convention between our Commanders and him were no secret; and yet, down to the moment of General Leclerc's attack upon this brave man in the field, he was treated by the French government as one of its most faithful and deserving subjects.

The Consul sent him a letter last year—a treacherous one I admit, but not the less fit to be quoted against his mightiness himself upon this point of poor Toussaint's character. Of this letter General Leclerc was the bearer, and the following are some of its expressions. "*We have conceived for you esteem, and we wish to recognize and proclaim the great services you have rendered to the French people. If their colours fly on St. Domingo, it is to you and your brave Blacks that we owe it. Called by your talents and the force of circumstances to the chief command, you have destroyed the civil war, put a stop to the persecutions of some ferocious men, and restored to honour the religion and the worship of God, from whom all things come."

Now I should like to know in what country but France men could be found impudent enough to call this great man a traitor for actions prior to that letter, after writing such things, and printing them in their own gazettes.

I will not detain my readers with stating and answering some other charges which the murderers of Toussaint have lately brought against him, on account of his treaty of neutrality with General Maitland, and the constitution which he afterwards framed for St. Domingo, with the consent of a general assembly of the people; for though it would be easy to shew that both these measures were not only guiltless, but such as redounded greatly to his honour, the proof of these truths would require some views of the state of St. Domingo and of France which cannot be given in a small compass; and the above confessions under the hand of the Consul, are surely enough to repel all charges of disloyalty against our hero down to the period of Leclerc's invasion.

Yet as to the constitution, I beg leave to add, a farther extract from the same official letter of Buonaparte:—"The situation in which you were placed, surrounded on all sides by enemies, and without the mother country being able to succour or sustain you, has rendered legitimate the articles of that constitution which otherwise would not be so."

* Dispatches of Leclerc o February 9. Moniteur of March 21, 1802.

Toussaint being relieved from the pressure of the war with England, set to work with new vigour in his plans for the public good.

The restoring the public worship of God, and spreading the knowledge of religious truth as far as he himself was blessed with it, were the objects nearest his heart. Next to these, which he knew to be the corner stones of public happiness, he was unwearied in his attempts to reform abuses; especially to set the idle to work, and by these and other means to improve the culture of the soil, and encourage that foreign commerce, which is so necessary to a West India island.

It is truly wonderful to think how much toil he must have gone through, even in the little we know of his public labours; for he had still from the perverseness of Rigaud's party a new insurrection to quell, and had to obtain possession of the Spanish part of that large island lately ceded to France, which the Spanish governor, upon various pretences, and perhaps by the secret request of the French government, long withheld. But at length the genius and activity of our Hero triumphed over all obstacles, and before peace was concluded between this country and France, every part of St. Domingo was in quiet submission to his authority, and rapidly improving in wealth and happiness under his wise administration.

So rapid was the progress of agriculture, that it was a fact, though not believed at the time in England, that the island already produced, or promised to yield in the next crop, one third part at least of as large returns of sugar and coffee as it had ever given in its most prosperous days. This, considering all the ravages of a ten years war and the great scarcity of all necessary supplies from abroad, is very surprising, yet has since clearly appeared to be true.

But what was of far more consequence, this great and growing produce was obtained without the miseries, the weakness, or dangers of West India slavery. Men were obliged to work, but it was in a moderate manner, for fair wages; and they were for the most part at liberty to chuse their own place. The plantation Negroes were therefore in general contented, healthful, and happy.

A still more happy effect had arisen from the new state of things, a blessing of the greatest importance to France, if she had not been mad enough to take the wicked measures, of which I shall soon have to speak, and not to France only, but to Africa, and to human nature. The effect I speak of was a large increase in the rising generation of Negroes, instead of that dreadful falling off which is always found in a Colony of Slaves.

My readers may be surprised at this fact, especially if they have ever met with any of those false and idle accounts which have been published, to persuade us that the loss of life among the island Negroes does not arise from oppression. "What, it may be said, can the young and infant Negroes of St. Domingo have increased by natural means since the revolution, in spite of perpetual war, foreign and civil, of frequent massacres, and of all the wants and miseries which, during twelve years, have fallen upon upon that hapless and devoted Island? How can this be, when in Jamaica, and other West India Islands, in the midst of peace and plenty, the same race of people are always declining in numbers, so that population can only be kept up by the Slave Trade?

I leave the defenders of slavery and the Slave Trade to answer the question. I will only offer for their help the opinion of a person whose judgment and impartiality they will readily admit. It is no other than Monsieur Malouet, formerly Minister of the French Colonies and Marine, an old West India Planter, a defender of the Slave Trade, and the champion of Buonaparte, in his late measures against Toussaint.

M. Malouet pulished a book last year at Paris, in which he attempts to justify the Consul for re-enslaving the Negroes in the West Indies, yet thus he writes of the state of Negro population in St. Domingo: "ALL ACCOUNTS ANNOUNCE A MUCH GREATER NUMBER OF INFANTS, AND LESS MORTALITY AMONG THE LITTLE NEGROES* THAN THERE WERE BEFORE THE REVOLUTION; WHICH IS ASCRIBED TO THE ABSOLUTE REST WHICH WOMEN BIG WITH CHILD ENJOY, AND TO A LESS DEGREE OF LABOUR ON THE PART OF THE NEGROES†".

Such then were the happy prospects at St. Domingo, when the peace with England unchained the French navy, and left the Consul at liberty to carry to the new world, the same scourge with which his fierce and ambitious temper had long afflicted the old.

And here we will finish the First Part of the History of TOUSSAINT.

* War and massacre will too fully account for there being on the contrary a decrease among the men. If the ravages of disease, usual in slave colonies, had been added, not a man fit to bear arms could have been left.

TOUSSAINT LOUVERTURE,

THE

AFRICAN HERO.

WE have brought our history down to the time of the last treaty of peace between England and France, which was a sad event in its consequences to Toussaint and his brave negroes.

The French till now had no means of shewing their gratitude to these black citizens for all their great important services in the war, except by sending them robes of honour, fair words, and general's commissions. Such trash you know, might be packed in a small compass, and was of no great value in the way of prize-money, when it fell into the hands of our seamen; but, as to the more bulky articles, which a West India island wants for its culture or defence, the grateful Consul could as well have sent them to the moon as to St. Domingo, without a pass from the British Admiralty. He had, however, no want of good will; he all along intended for the negro citizens the same kind of present of which he has been so liberal of late to Holland, Hanover, and Switzerland, and with which he generously proposes soon to enrich England also, if we are not bashful enough to reject it: I mean a large invading army. He was in such a haste thus to shew his regard for freedom, and for the common people in the West Indies, that I verily believe it was the greatest motive with him for putting an end to the last war with this country.

No sooner had peace tied up the hands of our provoking seamen, so that the ships of war of the great nation could be safely hauled out of the mud, and a truce patched up between the worms and their redoubtable bottoms, then out they flunk from their harbours, like a well-beaten and yelping cur out of a kitchen when at last you open the door to him; or rather like pole-cats, and other blood-sucking vermin, from their holes, when the hounds have left the common; and away they went for St. Domingo. I am told, by the by, though it is hard to believe, that the great admiral Villaret who commanded this fleet, was actually not ashamed to hoist his moth-eaten flag at the mast head. The poor admiral himself had been kept so long on board-wages ashore, that he was very sea-sick, as it is said, in crossing the Bay of Biscay, especially when a British ship of war happened to heave in sight of a morning. I am told too, that upon such occasions, it was rare fun to see how the French lubbers handled their ropes, and made our saucy tars laugh as heartily as the jockies at Edmonton did at Johnny Gilpin's horsemanship.

On board this famous fleet the Consul embarked at least 20,000 men. I cannot add, all good men and true, but they were at least good at cutting throats in cold blood, and true to their old practices at Jaffa. They were probably, however, not picked out for the purpose, for the French troops have in general been so well trained to that kind of service, that you might safely choose them in the dark; especially when the object is to slaughter a people, whether white or black, who have the insolence to defend their freedom. At the head of this army was placed general Leclerc, the Consul's brother-in-law; and he was assisted by several generals of great note, especially Rochambeau, well known in the West Indies, for his hatred of freedom, and fondness for the cart-whip: and so sure did the Consul make himself of speedily subduing liberty in the colonies, as easily as he had done every where else, that he sent over his brother Jerome in the fleet, to have a pluck at these new laurels, and his sister Madame Leclerc, with an infant in her arms, to receive them in her lap.

He hoped indeed to carry, by safer means than sieges and battles, his grand point at St. Domingo, which was nothing else than to force all the negroes to become slaves, and private property again, to his and Madame Buonaparte's very good friends, the planters. This little great man always wins the game by tricks rather than honours; and upon the present occasion, as upon others, he trusted much more to his falsehoods than his firelocks. He was resolved first indeed to seize upon the chief places on the sea-coast by surprise and violence, but hoped afterwards to subdue his enemies by bribery and cunning, rather than by war. He very well knew the great talents of Toussaint, and his power over the minds of the negroes; but there was something belonging to that great man, of which the Consul had no sort of notion, and that was his honesty. He thought, therefore, that Toussaint was to be bought, and determined if possible to buy him.

Now, do not think I point out this mistake out of spite to Buonaparte, in order to disgrace his judgment. I admit the Corsican to be as wise as any body that "says in his heart, there is no God" can be; but the poor man being bred an atheist, till he became a revolutionary soldier, and having known nobody but lads from the same bad school, can have no more notion of the principles of a moral and religious mind, than that chubby boy driving the plough yonder, with the broad nails in his shoes, has of the manners of my lady's drawing-room. It would be as easy for the little Consul to peep into a window six feet from the ground, as into the heart of a man like Toussaint. I am sorry to lose time with such remarks, but it is right to do justice to every man.

As our hero, however, was already the head man in St. Domingo, and had long been commander in chief and governor, by commission from the government of France, Buonaparte felt that the honours and rewards which he had to offer might perhaps not be a sufficient price to the negro general for treachery to his brethren. He therefore hit upon what seemed a surer snare for this great man's feelings; and this was to put his two beloved sons on board the fleet, as hostages for the father's conduct.

These youths had been sent by Toussaint to France for their education. He had trusted them to French honour and gratitude; and it would move any but French hearts to read the letter in which he anxiously recommended them to the care and protection of the government. You would think at every line you saw the fond father's tears dropping on the paper; but what was much more to be admired, his chief request was to have them brought up in the fear of God, and the knowledge of religion. Poor Toussaint! little did he then know the country to which they were going.

To take these youths from their studies, and send them out to catch their father, as you would catch a bird, by stripping her nest, and baiting a trap-cage with her young ones, seemed no doubt a bright thought to the Corsican. He has no children, or his heart, cold and hard though it is, might have checked him in so vile a purpose. To feel its baseness fully, a fact should be known, which is true beyond all reach of doubt, though this is not the place for its proof, that if Toussaint had yielded to the temptation, it would have been immediately fatal to him: the fixed design in that case, was to tear him in a few days from these dear bought children, and put him to death. The Consul had fully resolved, that when he should have got the chiefs of the free negroes in the West Indies into his power, either by force or fraud, they should not live to oppose his tyranny in future; witness his treatment of Pelage, the Toussaint of Guadaloupe, who joined the French general Richepanse, and by prodigies of valour at the head of his black troops, reduced the island to submission, relying upon the solemn promises of the Consul to maintain the general freedom of the blacks, yet his reward was to be seized by surprise, with all his brave officers, and either sold as slaves for the Spanish mines in Peru, or as is more probable, drowned at sea. Certain it is they were carried by ship-loads to sea, stowed like sheep in a pen, and heard of no more. But the history of the Consul's unparalleled wickedness at Guadaloupe may be the subject of a separate book.

Strong though Buonaparte's hopes were of succeeding by these virtuous means at St. Domingo, and making of Toussaint, first a vile instrument of his tyranny, and afterwards its certain victim, he was resolved to have two strings to his bow. He took extreme pains, therefore, and with too much success, to take the negro chief unawares, so that if found faithful, and clear sighted in the cause of freedom, he might be the more easily crushed by arms.

To this end the Consul loudly professed for our hero and his negroes the utmost admiration, gratitude and esteem, wrote him letters full of praises and promises, and confirmed the commission of commander in chief, which he held under the last and former governments of France. Far from avowing himself an enemy to the liberty of the negroes, this vile hypocrite pretended to be as fond of it as Toussaint himself. He went so far as to lay before his mock parliament, after the peace, and to publish in his gazettes, a plan which he pretended to have formed for the government of the French colonies, in which he solemnly declared, that the freedom of the negroes should be maintained in every colony wherein it then existed; and excused himself for not immediately putting on the same footing the slaves of Martinique and other places just restored to him by the peace, on account of the great and unavoidable evils of such a sudden revolution. "It would cost too much," said this matchless impostor, "to humanity!!"

For

For the same deceitful ends, he kept on foot that law of the republic, by which the negroes were all solemnly declared to be free French citizens. My readers may smile when I speak of French laws; and the gloomy face of the Corsican himself would be rounded into a laugh, if I should also speak of his oaths to maintain them; but brittle though the cobweb is, the spider does not usually break his own; and Buonaparte, in making a new constitution to his taste, had retained this law; and solemnly sworn to observe it as a part of that famous work. Since that time, whenever the constitution was to be tinkered, he has put the hammer into the hands of his slaves whom he calls tribunes and senators, so as to keep up the shew of respecting his own work till the desired hole has been made, or clout put on, by those his obsequious workmen. But, in this case, he did not call on his mock assemblies to revoke their solemn law of eight years standing, confirmed by his own constitution, and paid for by the West India negroes by the most essential services to the republic, till when think you? why not till full three months after he had publicly avowed to the British admiral at Jamaica, that his expedition was sent out to restore the old system of bondage, and had begun accordingly to murder the negroes by thousands, and tens of thousands, in hot blood, and in cold, for not submitting to become slaves again at his own imperious bidding.

Toussaint then was the more easily deceived, by supposing that in addition to every principle of honour, justice, gratitude and mercy, that can bind a nation, he had some security in the laws of the republic, and in the Consul's own constitution, as confirmed by his solemn oath.

But, lest the news of the great armaments that were preparing should, in spite of all this, put the negro chief on his guard, means were found to deceive him grossly, as to the amount of the force, and the place it was going to. We are not yet informed what arts were used for this purpose; but certain it is, that Toussaint expected only such a squadron and such a body of troops as the French government might naturally send in time of peace, for the use of a loyal colony. He supposed them to come only with friendly views, and by proclamation enjoined the negroes to receive them with affection, confidence and respect. He made no preparation whatever for defence, not even so much as to give the necessary orders to his subordinate generals who commanded in the towns on the coast. Such advantage had the Consul from his frauds, as if on purpose to shew in the event how impossible it is to bring back free men to cart-whip slavery, and to make the folly of the purpose as glaring, if possible, as its baseness.

While Toussaint was working night and day for the good of France, by restoring with all his might the tillage of her richest colony, the French fleet and army were stealing over the sea to destroy him and his useful labours. They at length arrived, and you would suppose perhaps that the first step of general Leclerc was to send notice of his arrival to the lawful governor of the island, whom he was sent to succeed, and demand peaceable possession of the town and forts in which he meant to quarter his forces. No such thing. General Leclerc went to work exactly like an invading enemy in time of war, though he had the modesty afterwards to complain, that he was not received as a friend. The moment he saw the coast of St. Domingo, he broke his force into three divisions, which fell like a sky-rocket, as nearly as possible possible at the same time, on the three principal towns of the island. Nothing could be better contrived. When blood is to be shed, the Consul's means are generally as wise, as his ends are weak and detestable.

At Fort Dauphin, where general Rochambeau arrived with the first division of the army before the two others could get round to their points of attack, the troops were instantly landed. No summons was sent to give the poor wondering colonists a chance of saving their lives by submission. The troops were drawn up in battle array on the beach. The negroes ran down in crowds to behold so strange a sight, and before they had any notice of what was designed against them, they were charged with the bayonet, and routed with the loss of many innocent lives.

So horrible a proceeding might not be believed, if it came from any other authors than the French butchers themselves. It is true the negroes are said to have called out, "no white men," but if so, it only confirms the cruelty of so abrupt a proceeding; during ten years they had seen no white soldiers but enemies, bent on their destruction. It is true also, that general Rochambeau says, he made "signs of fraternity" to the blacks before he attacked them; but these poor creatures were no doubt as much at a loss for the meaning of such pantomime mummery as of the invasion itself. The most ignorant inhabitants of Europe indeed know too well now what it signifies; but the negroes, not having seen this French free-masonry before, could not know that signs of fraternity were the sure forerunners of a massacre, till the bayonet reformed their ignorance.

While by such means possession was obtained of Fort Dauphin, the main body of the fleet and army under Villaret and Leclerc were hastening round to the Cape. They arrive the next day, and instantly prepare to land and take possession of the town; but Christophe, the black general, who commanded at this important post, having heard no doubt of the massacre at Fort Dauphin, bravely and loyally refused to suffer them to enter the harbour until he should receive orders from Toussaint. I say "loyally," for Toussaint, who was his lawful superior, was absent in the inner country, and Christophe only demanded time to send to him and receive his commands. The French ruffians have railed at him for this; but every good officer will approve his conduct. Indeed they were so conscious that the refusal was proper, as to endeavour to excuse their own violence by a palpable lie. They pretended to suspect that Toussaint was really in or near the town, and that his absence was only a pretence to gain time, though the contrary is manifest from what is afterwards stated in their own gazettes. The truth is, they resolved to profit by Toussaint's absence, and therefore landed the troops by force under cover of the ships, at the expence not only of many lives, but of the destruction of the town.

They have violently abused the brave and faithful Christophe for setting fire to this place, which, in his feeble and unprepared state, deserted as he was by all the white inhabitants, it was impossible for him to defend. But he had repeatedly warned the invaders that he should find it his duty thus to act, if they persisted in forcing a landing without giving him time to send to his commander in chief; and what what reasonable man or good soldier will blame him for keeping his word? What! was he to leave these good quarters behind him for lawless invaders to lodge themselves in, and thereby the better effect their perfidious and bloody designs? In the way they acted, they were entitled to the same reception in St. Domingo, as I trust they would meet in England; and were it necessary to burn Dover, to prevent French invaders from fixing in it, I hope no English governor would scruple to kindle the fire.

Another act, indeed, was half charged upon Christophe, which nothing could have excused. It was said in the first French accounts, that he had threatened to massacre the white inhabitants; and the Consul's gazette left it, with the usual fair dealing of that paper, to be supposed that this threat had been carried into effect. But the only voice which has been allowed to speak from the bloody stage of St. Domingo, that of the French government itself, has since fully cleared the negro chief from this suspicion. The inhabitants, to the amount of 2000, were carried off indeed as hostages, but not a man was put to death. Mark this my English readers, I entreat you, for you shall soon learn how opposite was the conduct of the French army, the only savages in this war, at least while Toussaint commanded.

Yes! by the French generals themselves, who avow that from the beginning of this war they gave no quarter, it is recorded to their own deathless infamy, that not a white man, of the many who upon this occasion fell into the hands of the negroes, found an enemy like the Hero of Jaffa. "*No person was killed at the Cape." "More than 2000 inhabitants of the Cape, who were in the most distant mornes, have returned†." Such are their very words. During three months these men must have been in the power of the negro chiefs, and during the same period general Leclerc, "the-virtuous Leclerc," as his precious brother-in-law styles him, had been putting Toussaint's soldiers to death in cold blood, as often as they fell into his hands. Oh shame to the white skins that cover French hearts!

My readers cannot spare time enough to hear the proceedings of these ruffians in the other parts of the island. I will only say, that they were of a piece with those which have been already noticed, and that every-where they refused to give the chance of saving bloodshed, by allowing the astonished negro officers time to send for orders to their commander in chief. Every-where they demanded instant possession of the forts, and every-where punished the proper refusal by as much murder as they were able to commit. As all these places were exposed to the cannon of the ships, and were quite unprepared for defence, the French succeeded so far as to oblige the negro troops to retire, but not till after some brave resistance.

All this while, for the whole was done in about forty-eight hours, Toussaint was in an inland part of the island, at too great a distance from the coast to give any timely assistance or orders at either of the points of attack.

* Account in Paris gazettes of 1st Germinal, (March 22.); London newspapers of March 29.

† Leclerc's official letter of May 8th, in which he gives an account of the pretended surrender of Toussaint.

The time was now come to try the force of corruption upon the mind of this African patriot. The first game had been played with success up to the Consul's wishes, except that Cape François had been burnt. The chief posts on the sea had been surprised and taken according to his merciless orders; the next point, therefore, was to win over Toussaint, if possible, now that he could be treated with safety, for to attempt it sooner, would have been to put the important advantage of surprise at the hazard of his virtue. Accordingly an ambassador was sent to him from the smoking ruins of Cape François, and the man chosen for the errand was Coisson, the tutor of his sons.

This man, a true Frenchman of the present day, as low in morals, as from his office we may suppose he was high in learning, was probably sent from France for the purpose of this vile attempt on the father of his pupils. I doubt not he had his lesson from the lips of the Consul himself. With him were sent the two youths, the one I believe about seventeen, the other probably fifteen, years old, who both had been separated seven or eight years from their affectionate parents, and were now doubtless much improved, not only in stature, but every other point of appearance that could rejoice the eye of a father. Ignorant as the poor lads were of public affairs, they had been taught that it was for their father's good to comply with the wishes of the Chief Consul; and Buonaparte himself had talked with and caressed them at Paris in order to impress that opinion on their minds. Like the hunch-back'd tyrant Richard he had fawned upon the poor boys, the better to effect his treacherous and bloody designs.

With these innocent decoys in his train, and with letters both from general Leclerc and the Consul, full of the most high-flown compliments to Toussaint, and the most tempting offers of honours, wealth, and power, Coisson set out from the Cape, and proceeded to the place of our hero's usual abode. His cruel orders were to let the boys see and embrace their father and mother, but not to let them remain: If the father should agree to sell himself, and betray the cause of freedom, he was to be required to come to the Cape to receive the commands of Leclerc, and become his lieutenant-general; but if he should be found proof against corruption and deceit, the boys were to be torn from his arms, and brought back again as hostages. If nothing else could move him, the fears and agonies of a parent's breast might it was hoped be effectual to bend his stubborn virtue.

"But how," some of my readers may be ready to ask, "was Coisson to be able to bring them back against Toussaint's inclination? What force had he to employ against the negro chief in the country?" I answer, a force which his base enemies well knew the sure effect of on his noble mind, the force of honour. A safe conduct was obtained from Toussaint, or his lieutenant-general; and the sacred faith of a soldier, whose word had never been broken, was engaged for the return both of the envoy and his pupils.

That vile tool of the Consul proceeded with the boys to Toussaint's house in the country, which, was a long day's journey from the Cape, but on their arrival the father was not at home, his urgent public duties having called him to a distant part of the island, where he was probably endeavouring to collect his scattered troops, and to make a stand against the invaders. The mother, however, the faithful wife of Toussaint, was there; and let my readers judge with what transports of tender joy she caught her dear long-absent children to her bosom. The hard-hearted Coisson himself says, "This good woman manifested all the sentiments of the most feeling mother *."

It was no hard task for the envoy to delude this tender parent. He professed to her, as he had declared to all the negroes he met with on his journey, so he has had the face to confess under his own hand, that the Consul had no design whatever against their freedom, but wished only for peace, and a due submission to the authority of the republic. The fond mother was ready to believe all he said. She ardently wished that it might be true, and that her beloved husband, with his superior knowledge and judgment, might see cause to confide in these pleasing assurances. The envoy has, unluckily for the cause of his employers, made it clearly appear in his account of this embassy, that if Toussaint had any object beyond the freedom of himself and his brethren, it was unknown to, and unsuspected by, the wife of his bosom. She instantly sent off an express to him to let him know that a messenger from the Consul was come with the offer of peace, liberty, and their children.

Toussaint was so far distant, that with all his wonderful speed in riding he did not arrive at Ennery (that was the place of this interesting home) till the following night. Ah! what pangs of suspense, what successions of hope and fear, must have wrung the heart of the poor mother in the interval. But her beloved husband at last arrives, and rushes into the arms of his children.

For a while the hero forgets that he is any thing but a father. He presses first the elder boy, then the younger, to his heart, then locks them both in a long embrace. Next he steps back for a moment to gaze on their features and their persons. Isaac, the elder, is so much grown that he is almost as tall as his father, his face begins to wear a manly air, and Toussaint recalls in him the same image that sometimes met his youthful eyes when he bathed in the clear lake among the mountains. The younger is not yet so near to manhood, but his softer features are not less endearing. The father sees again the playful urchin that used to climb upon his knees, and the very expression that won his heart in the object of his first affection. Again he catches both the youths to his bosom, and his tears drop fast upon their cheeks.

Let not my readers suppose this account is founded wholly on conjecture. Even the cold-blooded Coisson himself thus far in effect draws back the curtain, and opens the first scene of the tragedy in which he was an actor. The miscreant seems to value himself upon his firmness in pursuing his game unmoved by so affecting a scene, for thus he writes of it to his employers: "The father and the two sons threw themselves into each others arms. I saw them shed tears, AND WISHING TO TAKE ADVANTAGE OF A PERIOD WHICH I CONCEIVED TO BE FAVOURABLE, I stopped him at the moment when he stretched out his arms to me, &c." Englishmen, you have here a striking picture of French feelings! A virtuous and amiable hero is at the crisis of his fate; a fond father is pouring out the tears of manly sensibility over his long absent children. He stretches out his arms with an emotion of ill-placed gratitude to the tutor of their youth, when the same tutor, bent upon seducing him to his infamy and ruin, craftily seizes this moment as the most favourable for his treacherous designs!!! Nature has tender sympathies which even the cruel cannot well resist. There are situations in which even a ruffian cannot well avoid being turned by pity from his purpose. But these agents of the atheistical Consul seem to be pity-proof in all cases.

"O they are villains ev'ry man of them,
 "Fitted to stab and smile—to stab the babe
 "That smiles upon them!"

Coisson, retiring from the embrace of Toussaint, assails him in a set speech with persuasions to submit to the Consul, and to betray the cause of freedom. He does not perhaps desire him in plain terms to permit slavery to be restored, on the contrary protests that there is no such design; but Toussaint knew too well the meaning of such professions; and that his discerning mind on this point should be so imposed upon, after what had happened, could hardly be expected either by the envoy or his masters. Such speeches, if used to Toussaint himself, were probably meant only to save his credit, and give him a cue for deceiving his followers. He is in effect desired to come to the Cape and bring over his troops to join the French standard. On this condition he is assured of "respect, honours, fortune," the office of "lieutenant-general of the island," all in short that the gratitude of the republic could offer, or his own heart desire. On the other hand, if he should refuse to submit, the most dreadful horrors and miseries of war are denounced against him and his followers. The implacable vengeance of the great nation is threatened; and the eloquent envoy does not omit to point out to him how hopeless must be all his efforts to resist the armies which have conquered Europe, and which now will have no enemy to contend against but the rebels of St. Domingo. Above all, he is desired to reflect upon the fate that awaits the hostage youths, so beloved, and so worthy of his affection. "You must submit," said Coisson, "or my orders are to carry my pupils back to the Cape. You will not, I know, cover yourself with infamy by breaking faith and violating a safe conduct. Behold, then, the tears of your wife; and consider, that upon your decision depends whether the boys shall remain to gladden her heart and yours, or be torn from you both for ever*." The orator concludes by putting into the hero's hands the letters of the captain-general and the Consul.

Isaac next addresses his afflicted father in a speech which his tutor had no doubt assisted him in preparing. He relates how kindly he was received by the Consul, and what high esteem and regard that chief of the republic professed for Toussaint Louverture and his family. The younger brother added something which he had been taught to the same effect, and both with artless eloquence of their own, tried to win their father to a purpose, of the true nature and consequence of which they had no suspicion.

* I desire not to be understood as giving the exact language of this conference throughout; but the substance is either expressly avowed in, or plainly to be inferred from, Coisson's report, and other official papers.

Need we doubt that the distressed mother added her earnest entreaties to theirs?

During these heart-rending assaults on the virtue and firmness of Toussaint, the hero, checking his tears, and eying his children with glances of agonized emotion, maintains a profound silence. "Hearken to your children," cries Coisson. "Confide in their innocence; they will tell you nothing but truth."

Again the tears of the mother and her boys, and their sobbing entreaties, pour anguish into the hero's bosom. He still remains silent. The conflict of passions and principles within him may be seen in his expressive features, and in his eager glistening eye. But his tongue does not attempt to give utterance to feelings for which language is too weak. Awful moment for the African race! Did he hesitate? perhaps he did. It is too much for human virtue not to stagger in such a conflict; it is honour enough not to be subdued. But why do I speak of human virtue? The strength of Toussaint flowed from a higher fountain, and I doubt not that at this trying moment he thought of the heroism of the Cross, and was strengthened from above.

Coisson saw the struggle, he eyed it with a hell-born pleasure, and was ready in his heart to cry out "victory," when the illustrious African suddenly composed his agitated visage, gently disengaged himself from the grasp of his wife and children, took the envoy into an inner chamber, and gave him a dignified refusal. "Take back my children," said he, "since it must be so. I will be faithful to my brethren and my God."

Most of my readers, I fear, are but badly versed in history, and have read little of those who were called heroes in ancient times. I am sorry for it, because they will therefore have only my word for it, that there is nothing in history to be compared with this conduct of Toussaint.

Coisson, finding he could not carry his point, wished at least to draw our hero into a negotiation with general Leclerc; and Toussaint, always humane and fond of peace, was willing to treat upon any terms by which "the horrible fate," as he himself truly called it, which was intended for his brethren, might be avoided without the miseries of war. He, therefore, readily agreed to send an answer to the captain-general's letter, but would not prolong the painful family scene by staying to write it at Ennery, or again seeing his boys. It was two in the morning when he arrived there, and at four he mounted his horse again, and set off at full speed for his camp.

On the next day our hero dispatched a Frenchman of the name of Granville, who was the tutor to his younger children, with a letter for the captain-general; and this man, whom Coisson is anxious to prove as great a rogue as himself, overtook his brother-tutor and the two poor hostage-youths on their way to the Cape.

On the parting between the mother and her children, as it afforded no room to display his own talents at negotiation, the envoy has been prudently silent; but such of my readers as have feeling hearts will be able to paint it in some degree for themselves.

Toussaint's letter was of such a nature that it produced a reply from general Leclerc, and a further correspondence took place between tween these opposite leaders during several days, a truce being allowed for the purpose, which Leclerc expected, as he tells us, would have ended in a peace.

I would give much more, could I afford it, than would bribe any French minister, to be able to lay before my readers the letters that passed on this occasion; but Leclerc and the Consul have not thought fit to publish any of them; which to be sure is a great proof of their modesty and self-denial, because we have their own undoubted word for it, that these letters make very much for them, and very much against Toussaint. As to our hero, he had no means whatever of publishing the letters, or any thing else; for when his enemies took the towns, his printing-presses all fell into their hands; and, besides, not a letter was suffered to pass from the island, or any news from thence to be told, without leave from the Consul or his generals. We must be content with such intelligence as they have thought fit to give us; and I must do them the justice to say, that however much of their own wickedness they have kept back, they have suffered enough to peep out to satisfy any reasonable foe.

The treaty at length broke off, and we are told it was in consequence of a discovery manifestly made in Toussaint's letters, that he was a hypocrite, and only treated in order to gain time. Though they would not favour us so far as to let those letters speak for themselves, they might methinks have just hinted what Toussaint's demands were. It was good-natured however no doubt, not to expose him so far as to shew his selfish views; for to be sure they must have been very exorbitant, if he had asked more for himself than they had already offered to give him. In the absence of all information on this head from the French government and generals, I will take leave to suppose, that the liberty of the common people, with some security for that blessing, were the points in dispute, as they were the only things they would not yield, and were all that Toussaint sought to obtain. The only light which Leclerc's real or pretended dispatches give to assist our guesses respecting the nature of this negotiation, is reflected from his reason for putting an end to it. "My orders, says he, are immediately to restore prosperity and abundance." Now, unless the Heaven-sent Consul had the power of doing this by a miracle, I presume his means were that use of the driving-whip, by which men are made to work double and treble tides in the West Indies, and that Toussaint would have objected to no other means of making the island prosper, his former conduct sufficiently proves.

The truce being ended, war was most furiously renewed against Toussaint and his adherents in every quarter of the island, and that general and Christophe were by proclamation declared to be "out of the protection of the law."

Such of my readers as know any thing of the Consul's mode of governing, may stare at this phrase, and be ready to say, "why, this was only to put the negro chiefs on a footing with all the free people of the great nation." I admit, that to talk of putting a Frenchman out of the protection of the law, is like threatening a dog to strip off his coat and waistcoat. But the French are an odd people, and their words never mean the same thing that meets the ear. This is the phrase they use when men, for being loyal to their king, or true to the cause cause of freedom, are to be hunted down like wolves, and have a price set upon their heads; and such was now the treatment of our hero and the brave Christophe.

General Leclerc took, however, other steps far more useful to him in the war than either fighting or advertising for the head of Toussaint. He saw that it was easier to dupe the poor labourers, than to deceive men who had been accustomed to govern; he knew that the poor in all countries are apt to be discontented with their rulers, when they feel the public evils, which a war, necessary even for their own sakes, must always produce; and he also knew, that the labouring negroes, who were there called cultivators, had in general been loth to submit to necessary industry, and were but half content with Toussaint for putting by his laws, a curb upon idleness and vice. He therefore concluded, that it would not be impossible to make a breach between the upright chief and the cultivators; or, at least, to make the latter mere bye-standers in the war.

With this view, he, in the first place, forbore to attempt any change in the state of the labouring negroes in the places occupied by his troops. Though he had many of their old masters in his train, to whom the Consul had vowed that he would restore their slaves, and put the cart-whip soon again in their hands Leclerc did not suffer one of them to go upon his own estate; or only allowed them to go to confirm the new order of things, and treat the labourers as free men: Not a whip was to be seen or heard for some time on any account. But he went much further. He published in his own name, and the Consul's name, solemn declarations, that the freedom of all the people of St. Domingo should be held sacred. In the same papers he taxed Toussaint, and the soldiers who followed him, with ambition, and threw on them the blame of all the dreadful sufferings that were going to fall on the colony.

It is not to be wondered at, that a French invader should use these arts. In what country that has fallen under the dreadful yoke of the republic has not the same game been played in the beginning, as far as the state of the poor would allow? It may seem strange enough, that the poor cultivators should believe these gross pretences; but let it be considered that they were extremely ignorant, and knew nothing of the abominable tricks which the French had played in Europe, which every English labourer knows, if not led by knaves of his own country to shut his eyes against the day-light.

By such arts the great body of the honest hard-working men of St. Domingo were fatally led astray. All that was required of them was to stay at home on the plantations, to work as little as they thought fit, and to enjoy their freedom.

But Leclerc also assailed, with too much success, the fidelity of the soldiers, and of the black generals and officers who had commands under Toussaint. He held out to them the most tempting offers of preferment in the French service, if they would join his army; and two or three traitors, who came over to him on his first landing, were promoted to the highest commands, and caressed in a most flattering manner. He did not scruple to bind himself to every negro general who would trust his word, not only for the freedom of himself and his corps, but that of all the negroes in the island. There still remained there great numbers of the old party of Rigaud; and though these were zealous friends to freedom, and very suspicious of the white people, yet they hated Toussaint, because he had conquered and expelled their old leader; and they were therefore among the first to listen to the false assurances of Leclerc, and lend him their aid against their countrymen.

It was more by these base means, than by the bravery of his troops, that Leclerc obtained all his early successes, of which the French government so loudly vaunted itself early in the summer of last year. I admit that his French troops fought bravely, and with astonishing activity and perseverance, considering their disadvantages in that country; but, if they had not been powerfully assisted by negro allies, and if the cultivators had not been fools enough for the most part to resist the earnest calls of Toussaint, and remain quiet spectators of the war, the invaders would never have been able to advance far from the coast.

My book is already growing too bulky for the time of my readers, and it is no part of my undertaking to write the history of the war of St. Domingo. I could else very easily shew from the French gazettes, that whenever they engaged the negroes successfully, the latter were inferior in numbers, or at least in regular troops, as well as in arms. I could shew also from the same accounts, that in spite of that inferiority, Toussaint's troops more than once defeated the invaders. In a war in which the gazettes are all on one side, the accounts of the publishing enemy should be very strictly watched; and yet, with a common degree of attention, any readers of Leclerc's dispatches will find that these assertions are entirely true.

The courage of Toussaint in this war, as in all the former ones in which he had been engaged, was conspicuous. The only engagement with troops led by himself into action, of which his enemies have thought it prudent to speak, was the battle of the Ravine of Couleur, and of this action Leclerc gives the following account: "A combat of man to man commenced,—the troops of Toussaint fought with great courage and obstinacy, but every thing yielded to French intrepidity." He adds, indeed, that Toussaint evacuated a very strong position, and retired in disorder to Petite Rivière, leaving 800 of his troops dead on the field of battle. But let us remember that this is a French account, and that Toussaint's story is untold*.

Our hero's spirit was still more honourably displayed in his constancy and firmness. So powerfully did the dreadful scourge of war, inflicted upon all points of the colony at once by France and her numerous black confederates second the treacherous offers and promises of Leclerc, that such of the negro troops as still adhered to Toussaint, began to be weary of the contest, and every day almost some leading man among them went over to the enemy. From the first, the regular troops he was able to collect were not very numerous: So far appears even from the accounts of his enemies, who certainly could not wish to represent the force they had been opposed by, as less than it really was.

* See Leclerc's official dispatches of February 27. London papers of April 19. 1802.

So many of the military negroes had been induced to join the French; or at least to lay down their arms; and so great a proportion of the rest had been killed in action, that the black generals, by the end of the month of February in which the war began, were chiefly supported by such of the cultivators as the influence of Toussaint could preserve from the deceits of Leclerc, and engage to fight in the cause of their own freedom.

But these men were a very small proportion of the whole body; and they were, besides, but indifferent soldiers, not having been previously taught the military exercise, and being very badly armed. These cultivators too began to quit the standard of Toussaint when he was obliged to retire into the inner part of the island, so that at last he had, as his enemies admit, only a few hundred followers, with whom he was obliged to retreat to the mountains, and there of course to endure a great variety of hardships.

Yet even in this seemingly hopeless state of affairs, the constancy of Toussaint never yielded for a moment. He never despaired of the cause of freedom, never offered to abandon it; but still preferred all the dangers and sufferings of war, to a peace which would have placed him in safety, riches, and power, but which must have been bought at the expence of his honour and virtue, or let me rather say, of his duty to God. Wordly men may be thought stanch patriots, and may think themselves so; but there are cases too trying for any virtue that is not rooted in religion. To devote himself to the public good, and sacrifice all that is dear to him, even life itself, when the very people for whom all this is to be suffered distrust, forsake and betray their generous champion, is a flight of virtue too high for any one who does not, like Toussaint, expect his praise and his reward in a better world.

After many bloody actions, and six or seven weeks of almost perpetual marching and fighting, the French general thought himself master of St Domingo. He boasted to his brother-in-law, and the Consul proclaimed to all Europe, that the object of the war was accomplished. "Toussaint, without stations, without treasure, without army, is no more than a brigand, wandering from morne to morne with some brigands like himself, whom our intrepid warriors are pursuing, and whom they will soon have caught and destroyed."

Thus spoke the Consul to his mock parliament at Paris, on the 6th of May 1802. He very probably, for novelty's sake, that morning spoke as he thought; he had even some good grounds for the opinion, and yet, (mark, my readers, the shortness of a tyrant's triumph, when free men with brave leaders oppose him), while the Consul was yet speaking, dispatches were entering his harbours to tell him that his boasts were vain, and that liberty was victorious in St. Domingo. Before the first day of that month, the "flying and helpless brigand" he spoke of, had defeated and foiled the veteran armies of France, driven them back to the coast, besieged them there, and obliged the captain-general solemnly to renounce, by the establishment of negro freedom, the whole object of the war.

But the means by which these grand reverses, so glorious to our hero, were produced, must be reserved for the third part of this history.

TOUSSAINT LOUVERTURE,

BUONAPARTE thought that he had triumphed over freedom in the West Indies with the same ease as in Europe. He supposed that the planters, now, when he had caught their human cattle for them, would have nothing to do but to put the beasts again into harness. But the Consul here reckoned without his host. He did not consider, or did not know, that there was still as great a difference between the state of his French citizens, and that of West India slaves, as between spaniels and ill-used hack horses; and that the feelings of animal nature might prove harder to subdue than the love of an injured country, and the pride of freedom.

Had the object of the war in St. Domingo been only such as was falsely given out there to the deluded cultivators, that dreadful war would soon have ended, and probably never revived. The authority of the Republic, which had in truth never been disputed, would have been confirmed by the early successes of the French army, and for any other purpose but that of restoring a hated and intolerable slavery, would have been easily maintained. General Leclerc was, in appearance, master of the colony, and Toussaint compleatly ruined by the middle of March in the last year, when the very successes of the French General proved fatal to his cause, by emboldening him to throw off his mask.

The great, the never-failing allies of French invaders, to which, more than to their courage, they owe all their conquests, are cunning, and hypocrisy. They pretend to respect freedom where they find it, and to give it where they find it not, and thus catch a people as you catch a horse on the common, by holding out the sieve with corn, and hiding the whip and the halter behind you. But in this case, the trick was foolishly laid open before the end was secured.

Leclerc, puffed up with victory, and thinking that he had now nothing more to fear from the black troops, supposed that the sooner he should put the plantation Negroes again under the drivers and the whips, the better he should secure his conquest, and the more honor he should obtain; for this was the true, and every where but in St. Domingo, the acknowledged object of all his bloody labours. I suspect too that the orders of his violent brother-in-law obliged him to make this change the moment he was master of the Island. The wonder-working Consul had sworn, perhaps to Madame Buonaparte, and her West India friends, that he would give them back their property in human flesh, as speedily as he had wrested Italy from the hands of the Austrians.

By whatever motive he was urged to such rashness, certain it is that the French general thought it was now time to drop his disguise. In the month of March, I know not exactly on what day, but it was probably about the middle of that month, he published an order, expressly restoring to the planters all their former power over the Negroes belonging to their estates.

The worthy General seems here to have driven harder than the planters themselves desired, or at least than they judged to be safe; for about the same time it was necessary to take strong measures to compel such of them as were in the Island to live upon their own estates; and a writer of their party in a letter from Port-au-Prince, of March 24th, in speaking of this order with praise, yet shew his doubts of its being practicable: "Orders have just been received which will probably re-establish agriculture in our plains and mountains, *if they are capable of being executed. Proprietors, or their Attornies, are restored to their ancient authority over the Negro cultivators."

If even the planters were unprepared for this bold measure, judge what a thunder-clap it was to the astonished cultivators! The proclamations were not yet five weeks old, by which they were promised the full enjoyment of their freedom, upon the sacred word of this same Captain-General, and that of the great Consul himself. How amazed, then, must they have been at the impudence as well as baseness of these dissemblers!

But they ought chiefly to have blamed their own folly and their ingratitude to the brave Toussaint. In vain had that wise and faithful leader said to them: "Distrust the Whites, they will betray you if they can; their desire evidently manifested is the restoration of slavery; their proclamations are only formed to deceive the friends of liberty: do every thing to avert the horrid yoke with which we are threatened†." They had not listened in time to these truths—they had taken the word of French invaders rather than that of their faithful Chief. They had foolishly thought, "We have nothing to do with the quarrel; we shall have to work in the same way which ever party conquers." They now saw their mistake too late. What a lesson for the common people in every country!

The Negro troops who had joined the invaders, were also alarmed at this step of the French General. It was not less a breach of faith towards them, than towards the cultivators, for they had come in under the proclamations, which promised freedom, not to themselves only, but to all their brethren. They could not be so blind as not to see that equal treachery, and a fate as horrid, was in store for themselves; but they durst not immediately revolt, for they had been prudently broken into small bodies, and had been placed at a distance from each other, and mixed with the White troops; and had also, by the discharge upon various pretences of great numbers from each of their corps, been greatly reduced in strength; at the same time they were closely watched by the Frenchmen.

If West India slavery were not in its nature a thousand times worse than any thing called slavery in Europe, the Negroes thus betrayed and divided, and dispirited as they no doubt were, would probably have submitted, at least for a while, till a fairer opportunity of resisting should offer. But men who have been delivered from that "horrible yoke," will risk and suffer every thing rather than receive it again.

Toussaint well knew this important truth, and therefore saw at once his means of victory in this imprudent wickedness of his enemies.

Instead of continuing his flight among the mountains, he turned short towards the North coast of the Island, where a very extensive and fertile plain surrounds Cape François, and where there was, in consequence, the greatest number of cultivators. He summons them to arms, and they are not now, as before, deaf to his voice. They rise in a mass around him, hailing him as their deliverer and guardian angel.

These new troops were badly armed, or rather, for the most part, not armed at all, except with hoes, and a kind of cutlass, which is used in the West Indies for trimming the green fences. But their numbers and zeal enable their brave leader to surmount all difficulties. He pours like a torrent over the whole plain of the North, every where seizing the French posts, and driving their divisions before him, till they find refuge within the fortifications of Cape François.

Toussaint had no battering artillery; yet he surrounded the town, made several sharp attacks upon it up to the very mouths of the cannon, and would certainly have taken the place, had not the fleet been lying in the harbour. The French were obliged to land the marines, and 1200 seamen from the fleet, to raise new batteries, and to haul the ships close in shore, where their broadsides might play upon the besiegers. Yet, after all, the place must have yielded to the intrepid Toussaint and his husbandmen, if General Hardy, with a grand division of the French army from the South, had not advanced by forced marches, and thrown himself into the town.

The Captain-General himself was obliged to follow by sea, quitting his conquests in the South, after having marched back all his victorious detachments from the interior to the coast.

It is truly wonderful to consider in how short a time these great reverses were effected. About the middle of March, the French were at the summit of their successes and confidence; yet by the 9th of April, they were reduced to such extremity, that Leclerc, besieged at the Cape, and hardly able to maintain himself there, was upon the point of retreating by sea to the Spanish part of the Island.

I cannot detain my readers so long as would be necessary, were I to relate all the reverses and disasters which the French sustained in various quarters of the Island, from their rash attempt to restore the cart-whip slavery. The Negroes were now every where become as hostile to them, as they had been disposed to be friendly before.

But at the Cape the chief struggle was maintained, and the deepest miseries felt. The fever began now to fight for the Negroes, and that capital became a mere pest-house; though till this reverse of fortune, the French troops had been remarkably healthy. Powerful reinforcements arrived from France, but all to no purpose; Toussaint still pressed the siege; and all that the large garrison could do was to defend themselves within the walls and trenches.

General Leclerc now felt and bitterly lamented his error; he had too soon dropped the mask, and he saw that, unless some new means of deceit could be found, all was lost; and yet with all the ignorance of the cultivators, and all their dislike to the hardships of war, it seemed very difficult to delude them again.

But a French genius is rarely at a fault when fraud is the game; and Leclerc, "*the virtuous Leclerc!" was, in this respect, not a whit behind even his honest brother-in-law himself.

It was too late to deny that there had been a design to restore slavery; but it was perhaps possible, as Leclerc supposed, to make the Negroes believe, that the Consul, and he himself had been deceived as to the true state of the colony, and that convinced by disasters how vain the late attempt was, he had repented of and abandoned the purpose. The Negroes did not know that Buonaparte was too proud, and too fond of despotism, ever to give up any plan he had formed against freedom; and therefore might be led to expect, that what his brother-in-law, the Captain-General, should engage for in their favour, the Consul would stand to and confirm.

It seemed therefore to Leclerc not impossible, that artful professions of a change of measures, and new promises to maintain freedom might gain credit, and a treaty be patched up with his Black enemies, so as to give him a new opportunity of dividing the people from their military defenders, and getting the latter into his power; after which he was resolved they should hear no more again of the cart-whip, till he had made surer work, by destroying Toussaint and his adherents.

With these righteous views, General Leclerc framed a proclamation, which is a perfect master-piece of French cunning and imposture. Without expressly acknowledging the injustice of his past measures, or his design against freedom, and even without ceasing to speak of the first resistance of the armed Negroes as rebellious, he artfully began this paper with an implied apology for his late attempts on the score of his ignorance of the colony, and of the character of the people. He dexterously passed over his own orders for the restoration of slavery, and treated what had been notoriously done to that end, as arising from the want of a new form of government, which the war had not left him sufficient leisure to frame; as if the known attempts to bring back the cart-whip, had been a natural and necessary consequence of the want of positive regulations to the contrary.

He next affected to frame a constitution for the island, of which liberty and equality to all the inhabitants, without distinction of colour, was to be the basis.

This, he added, should not be definitive till approved by the French government; but the condition was so worded, that it might be applied either to the basis of liberty and equality, or to a most unmeaning plan of organization, as he calls it, which was to be founded upon that basis.

In addition to this important concession, he by the same instrument, called an assembly of representatives of the Island, who were to be appointed; without distinction of colour, to consult and advise for the general good; and the powers of this assembly were as carefully limited, as if the impostor had really designed to establish such a form of government. He knew that the Negroes had not political knowledge enough to care about such limitations; and that all they would value or understand was the acknowledgment of their freedom, and the admission of Negroes to a share in the government; while his affected caution as to the powers of the assembly, would serve to convince them of his sincerity*. This vile

* This proclamation is here inserted at large, as a curious specimen of French hypocrisy:

LIBERTY.

EQUALITY.

In the Name of the French Government,

A PROCLAMATION.

The General in Chief to the Inhabitants of Saint Domingo.

CITIZENS,

The time is arrived when order will succeed to that chaos which has been the necessary consequence of the opposition made by the rebellious to the landing of the army at St. Domingo.

vile production was dated the 25th of April, and immediately after sent into the camp of the Negroes, and to every part of the Island, accompanied with offers of peace and general amnesty; and I lament to say, that the stratagem had all the immediate effects which its base author could have desired.

The Negroes, at large, were naturally weary of the war; they were still cut off from the chief ports, and foreigners were afraid to attempt to trade with them, and consequently they were deprived of all the necessaries and comforts of life, with which commerce used to supply them. The cultivators in particular were, by their new duties as soldiers, not only exposed to extreme dangers and hardships to which they were before unaccustomed, but separated from their wives and children, and no longer able to till their provision-grounds for the support of their families.

They could see no speedy end to these and other evils, but a peace; for re-inforcements were daily arriving from France, and they could have no hope, while that was the case, of being able to finish the war, by expelling the invaders from the fortified towns and harbours on the coast. For freedom only could they be willing to fight and suffer such things; and if freedom was now sincerely offered; what more could they desire?

Whilst the ignorant multitude thus reasoned and felt, the enlightened Toussaint probably saw the matter in a different view; he knew the craft of his enemies, and feared perhaps that these offers, like the first, were only snares for himself and his brethren.

The rapid operations and progress of the army, and the necessity of providing for its subsistence and establishment, have hitherto prevented my attending to the definitive organization of the colony. I could not moreover have any fixed or certain ideas of a country with which I was totally unacquainted; and consequently could not, without mature deliberation, form an opinion of a people who have been for ten years a prey to revolutions.

The basis of the provisionary organization which I shall give to the colony, but which shall not be definitive till approved of by the French government, is Liberty and Equality to all the inhabitants of St. Domingo, without regard to colour. This organization comprises:

- 1st The administration of justice.
- 2d. The interior administration of the colony, combined with those measures which its interior and exterior defence require.

As it is of infinite interest to you, Citizens, that every institution should, in an equal degree, protect agriculture and commerce, I have not determined upon this important work without having first had recourse to, and consulted with, the most distinguished and enlightened citizens of the colony.

I have, in consequence, given orders to the Generals of the South and West divisions to select for each of these departments, seven citizens, proprietors, and merchants, (without regard to colour), who, with eight more which I shall myself choose for the department of the North, are to assemble at the Cape in the course of the present month, to impart their observations to me on the plans I shall then submit to their consideration.

It is not a deliberative assembly I establish. I am sufficiently acquainted with the evils which meetings of this nature have brought upon the colony to have that idea. The citizens who are thus chosen being honest and enlightened men, to them will I communicate my views; they will make their observations upon them, and will be able to impress on the minds of their fellow-citizens the liberal ideas with which government is animated.

Let those, then, who are thus to be called together, consider this appointment as a flattering proof of my consideration for them. Let them consider that for want of their counsels and advice, I might pursue measures disastrous to the colony, which would ultimately fall upon themselves. Let them consider this, and they will find no difficulty in leaving, for some time, their private avocations.

(A true Copy.)

But it is easier in such cases for a true patriot to form right opinions, than to prevail on the people to follow them; even his faithful second in command, Christophe, was probably inclined to the side of peace; and I suspect that the large army of cultivators under that General's command were clamorous in their desires that he should embrace the offered terms.

The French accounts pretended that Christophe deserted his commander in chief, and, by making his own submission, obliged Toussaint to follow the example; but this was just as true, "as that both these Negro Chiefs begged their lives of Leclerc, and surrendered as pardoned rebels," which, as we shall presently see, was the bare-faced pretence of the Consul on this occasion, in order to hide their triumph and his own disgrace. This slander on the brave Christophe, was invented to make the pretended submission of our Hero, at a time when he was known to be victorious, appear less monstrously unnatural, than every thinking man must have seen that gross pretext to be.

If any truth was mixed up with the many falsehoods contained in those impudent accounts, the fact probably was, that both Christophe and Dessalines, the Negro General next in authority, were dupes to Leclerc's vile contrivance, and desirous of peace, and that their persuasions and wishes determined our Hero to treat with the French General, contrary to his own better judgment. From the piety and humanity of his character, the natural bias of his own mind must have acted in the same direction.

Whatever the motives were, certain it is, that the proclamation soon answered the desired end, and that prior to the 8th of May 1802, a peace was concluded with our Hero and all the Generals and troops under his command; in which the whole people of St. Domingo concurred.

Thus was the sword of victory taken out of the hands of Toussaint; and thus only were the French invaders delivered for a while from that fate, which their wickedness richly deserved.

My readers may perhaps remember the foul misrepresentations of the Consul, to which I have just alluded. When the news of this peace first reached Europe, Buonaparte had the gross impudence to call it the submission of Toussaint and his Generals. He published a letter in the Moniteur, to which he put the name of General Leclerc, and in which he actually went so far as to make Toussaint come in a manner with a rope about his neck, begging for pardon as a guilty rebel; and what is more, General Leclerc is made to refuse for a long time, to let him escape hanging.

There is a boldness in the Consul's impostures, which clearly point out their author; for no other man, no other Frenchman even, would have assurance enough to set his face to them. Other dissemblers can no more soar up to the pitch of his impudence, than a boy's kite can overtake a balloon.

Leclerc, certainly would not, for the sake of his own credit, have written such self-contradictory absurdities as that pretended letter of his contained; and I must say, the Consul ought to have had more regard to the character of so near a connection, than to suffer him to be exposed as he soon after was. Having put Leclerc's name to that same story, he might at least have watched his own enslaved press better, than to let it copy, two or three days afterwards, the proclamation of which we have been speaking; and also a letter from Leclerc to Toussaint, from the Captain-General's own Gazette, at Cape François; for these papers both gave the lie to every sentence in the pretended official dispatches, and shewed to all Europe, that Leclerc himself, instead of the Negro Chief, had been obliged to submit and beg pardon.

The letter of Leclerc to this hardly-pardoned rebel, contains the following passages:—"You General, and your troops, will be employed and treated like the rest of my army. With regard to yourself, you desire repose, and you deserve it. After a man has sustained for several years the burthen of the government of St. Domingo, I apprehend he needs repose. I leave you at liberty to retire to which ever of your habitations you please. I rely so much on the attachment you bear to the colony of St. Domingo, as to believe that you will employ the moments of leisure which you may have in your retreat, in communicating to me your views respecting the means to be taken to make agriculture and commerce again flourish. As soon as a list and statement of the troops under General Dessalines are transmitted to me, I will communicate to you my instructions as to the position they are to take*."

How condescending this style in the great General Leclerc, towards a convict just saved at his own repeated petition from the gallows! How gracious in a conqueror thus to leave his vanquished enemy in command over his own rebellious troops, and over the army of Dessalines, another pardoned rebel!

I fear that in other countries, as well as in France, the accounts given of distant events in time of war, are not always framed with a strict regard to truth; but never perhaps before, in the history of the world, did any government disgrace itself by falsehoods so gross as Buonaparte published upon this occasion.

Two things very honourable to our Hero's character, may be learnt from this letter of General Leclerc: First, it appears that Toussaint who even before he had conquered, was offered "rank, honors, fortune," all that the Consul could bestow, asked no favor for himself when in a condition to dictate his own terms. He obtains all he asked, and that all is, retirement. Secondly, we find that his retirement to private life was his own choice, and not as the Consul impudently pretended, a thing prescribed to him by Leclerc. It was a virtuous choice, and, notwithstanding the event, a wise one. Perfidy might have surprised him any where; but it was by retirement only, that after what was past he could avoid the risk of incurring suspicion with a government not disposed to be perfidious. Constrained, in all probability by the general wish, to make a peace, which he saw would be insecure, he took the course which was under such circumstances the least dangerous for himself and for the public. If the Captain-General meant well, it would leave no motive, if ill, no decent pretext, for the violation of the treaty.

In these last measures of Toussaint, we find therefore as in all the rest of his illustrious career, a rare union of wisdom, dignity, and virtue.

As our Hero here sheathes for ever that sword which was sacred to Freedom and Justice, I would wipe from it an injurious stain which has dropped from the false lips of his oppressors.

There is, in spite of slander, no just ground to believe that one drop of blood not shed fairly in the field, and in the heat of action, ever tarnished the glory of Toussaint.

* See this letter copied from the French Gazettes in the London Newspapers of June 19.

There is even positive evidence to prove his innocence of any such crime, though he has had no means of making his own defence, and though the ruffians who stifled his voice have been for the most part his only historians.

In order to establish these truths as fully as justice to our Hero would require, it would be necessary to exceed very far the limits which the plan of this little work prescribes to me; for as Buonaparte suffered nobody to print news from St. Domingo but himself, it is only by putting together, and comparing, the various accounts published by him at different times, that we can discover the gross falsehoods he has told, and the truths he has laboured to conceal; but there will not be room enough in this little book for the many parts of those impudent papers which I should have in this case to compare with each other, much less for the needful remarks.

It is my design soon to print an Appendix, for the use of such of my readers as can afford the money and time it may cost them; and I shall there prove our Hero's innocence most undeniably out of the Consul's own mouth. Mean time I must be content with offering the testimony of my sincere belief, founded upon much enquiry and reflection, that Toussaint was in no degree guilty of the charges in question; but, on the contrary, maintained, through the whole of his last war, that humane and generous conduct for which, during all his former life he had been distinguished.

Highly provoked though this much injured Hero was by every species of injustice, fraud, and cruelty, on the part of his enemies, I firmly believe that he did not put one of them to death in a way unbecoming a Christian soldier; and that the only savages in St. Domingo, while he commanded, were savages with white faces. He has had no trial, not even before a French tribunal; he has had no hearing at the bar of the public, his voice has been stifled by the strong arm of despotism, not a pen in St. Domingo or France, but those of his slanderers and murderers, has been allowed to record or remark upon his conduct; and yet it has pleased God to provide the means of clearing his fair fame, to the credit of his Christian principles, and to the disgrace of his infidel oppressors.

Happy should I be for the credit of civilized human nature, if the crimes of the French commanders were as unreal as those which their gazettes have falsely imputed to their noble-minded enemy. But here there is no room for contradiction or doubt. Here my readers will be spared the trouble of reasoning—they have only to read, and I have only to copy for their perusal, the confessions, or rather the boasts, of the ruffians themselves.

"Being attacked by the rebels, he killed sixty-eight and made forty-five prisoners, among whom was the chief of this division of the rebels. He was instantly shot.*"

"General Hardy surrounded on the Coupe a l'Inde six hundred Negroes, WHO RECEIVED NO QUARTER†."

"General Salines possessed himself of one of the enemy's camps, with baggage, and put TWO HUNDRED MEN TO THE SWORD‡."

"The enemy threw himself upon the Aztibonite, &c. &c. The WRETCHES were put to the sword§."

* Villaret's Official Letter of March 4. London Papers of April 19, 1802.

† Leclerc's Official Letter of March 24. London Papers of May 26.

‡ Ibid. § Ibid.

"The enemy took the resolution of evacuating La Crête a Pierrot—they were overwhelmed by our troops, who gave them no quarter.*"

It is needless to go further with such extracts. It is unnecessary also to judge of what horrors remain untold, when these miscreants, fighting as they were for an object as contrary to law, justice, and gratitude, as to their own solemn promises, avowed such conduct early in the war.

It was natural that these ruffian French commanders, or the Consul for them, should wish to involve the brave and humane Toussaint in the shame of equal enormities. For my own part, I can justify him upon none but his own Christian principles, for abstaining from all retaliation. Had he been an infidel like themselves, he might, consistently with worldly honor, and worldly humanity, have put all their adherents to the sword; and the massacres they falsely impute to him could, if real, not have been complaints in their mouths, without impudence matchless like their own.

My history must not extend to a period beyond the death of Toussaint, or I should have to state conduct of these barbarian Frenchmen that would make my readers forget the cold-blood massacres here noticed.

Not merely prisoners of war, but hundreds and thousands of unoffending fellow-creatures, whom the savages themselves called innocent, have been daily and nightly suffocated and drowned for the sole purpose of rooting out their hapless race. As to prisoners of war, simple death has been thought far too mild a fate for them. If report may be trusted, they have been treated in a way so horrid, beyond all example in this bad world, that though I believe the dreadful rumour, for the sake of our common natures I will not repeat it.

Let us now proceed to the last act of the illustrious life of Toussaint. I shall write it with shame as well as indignation; for though I thank God I am not a Frenchman, I am a White man, and a native of Europe.

The Hero had retired to his peaceful family mansion at Gonaives, which is on the South West coast of St. Domingo, at a little distance from St. Marcs. He had there a small estate which was called by his own surname, Louverture, and where he probably hoped long to enjoy the peace and leisure to which he had for ten years been a stranger, and to indulge his warm affections in the society of his beloved wife and their surviving children.

The two promising youths, of whom I spoke in a former part of this history, were probably now no more, and had left a melancholy blank in the family circle. I suspect that they had either perished in the war, or been put to death by the humane and virtuous Leclerc, to punish the crimes of their father.

I would not willingly lay to the charge of that bad man, who is now gone to his dreadful account, any sin of which he is not guilty: I therefore do not assert as a certain fact that the young men were murdered†, but I believe that to be the truth.

Toussaint,

* Admiral Villaret's official letter of April 8th, London Papers of May 26th.

† It is said by Coisson, whose narrative was formerly quoted, that the lads were sent back to their father, and detained by him, at the end of the fruitless negotiation in February. But for this act of generosity, so unlike all the other conduct of Leclerc, we have only the word of his own vile agent; and it so happens that we hear of the hostage youths no more. If they had been with their father they would have been arrested, and sent away like the rest, as we shall presently see; for it is expressly stated, that the whole family

Toussaint, however, was a Christian, and therefore he was, no doubt, beginning to taste with thankfulness the family blessings that remained to him, without repining for those which it had pleased God to take away. But Providence had new trials, and I trust new triumphs at hand, for the patience of this distinguished servant.

On a sudden, at midnight, the Creole frigate, supported by the Hero, a 74 gun ship, both dispatched on purpose by Leclerc from the Cape, stood in towards the calm beach, near Gonaives. Boats, with troops, immediately after landed, and surrounded the house of Toussaint, while he was at rest with the faithful companion of all his cares and fortunes.

Brunet, a Brigadier-General, and Ferrari, Aid-de-Camp to Leclerc, who have both been praised in the Moniteur for this honorable service, entered the chamber of the Hero with a file of grenadiers, and demanded of him to go, with all his family, on board the frigate.

The lion was in the toils, and resistance was hopeless; but Toussaint was still himself; still dignified, generous, and feeling. He submitted as far as concerned his own fate, without gratifying his base enemies by a murmur: but alive to the fears, and to the dangers of his wife and children, he requested that they might be left at home, and would have made that the condition of his own compliance. This condition, however, his ruthless oppressors would not grant; for the destruction of all who were dearest to Toussaint was part of their detestable purpose. An irresistible military force appeared, and the whole family, including the niece of a deceased brother, were carried on board the frigate, and from thence embarked in the Hero, which proceeded with them immediately to France.

I will not offer such an insult to my readers as the Consul offered to Frenchmen, and to Europe, in supposing that the gross perfidy of this proceeding can be made to bear a serious doubt.

Of what stuff could the Corsican despot suppose other men's judgments to be made, when he talked of Toussaint's conspiring so soon after the peace? How could this great man have hoped that conspiracy would put him in a better condition than he lately stood in, when with a triumphant army at the gates of Cape François, he saw his enemies perishing in its hospitals? Yet this was the position he had within three weeks exchanged for peace. Or to take the Consul even on his own false grounds, if our Hero had begged his life at the head of his army, because he could no longer resist, what motive could he so soon have had for, or what hope could he have placed in resistance, now when that army was no more at his command, but had entered into the service of his conquerors?

To crown the wicked absurdity, the pretended proof of his treason, was the writing a confidential letter to Christophe, who, as we are told by the same account, had three weeks before deserted and betrayed him.

family was sent to France; yet the arrival of his wife, with two children only, was noticed in the French papers; these were not spoken of as the young men so well known in France; and it is certain that Toussaint had other children old enough to be under a tutor's care in St. Domingo at the time of the invasion.

There has since been a rumour through America of the young Toussaints' being at the head of an insurrection, but it proved groundless. I have anxiously watched for some notice of them since, but in vain. They are missing, therefore, ever since their return from Eunery to the Cape, and it belongs to their keepers to account for them.

I mention

I mention not these absurdities with a view seriously to refute them, but rather to shew how ill this shallow little despot, for such in spite of his great fortune he is, can give plausibility to his own impostures.

When the distance from the Cape to Gonaives is considered, and that there had elapsed only about a month from Leclerc's peace with Toussaint, to the date of his dispatches, giving an account of the arrest of that General, and of his departure for France, it seems probable that the ships of war were sent from the Cape to seize him almost as soon as he had arrived at his home.

The history of mankind does not afford an instance of perfidious conduct so shockingly gross and shameless as this action: I will not even except the Consul's own conduct towards Pelage at Guadaloupe, though that General was treated in the same manner, as was avowed in the Moniteur, immediately after his brave and important services to the French government, and without even an attempt to lay a single fault to his charge.

The measures of the Captain-General had been so well taken for this treacherous proceeding towards Toussaint, that the Negro troops and officers, who were indignant at such base usage of their Great Leader, could make no effectual resistance. They had been previously dispersed through the island in different garrisons, and mixed with the European troops, and were besides closely watched.

Two principal chiefs among them, however, had the courage to fly to arms, in the hopeless attempt to rescue or die with their brave commander. I am sorry that I cannot record the names of these generous men. Leclerc, in adding to his own former disgraces, the infamy of shedding their blood, has only spoken of them as chiefs. "Two insurgent chiefs are already arrested, I have ordered them to be shot.*"

He avows, in the same letter, that a hundred of the principal confidential friends of Toussaint had been arrested; and though he lays nothing to their charge but their having possessed the friendship of that Hero, he tells us, without ceremony, of their being also embarked on ship-board as exiles. He might have said more briefly, "these I have ordered to be drowned." The terms are, "I have sent a part of them on board the frigate Mucron, which has orders to proceed to the Mediterranean; the rest have been distributed on board the different ships."

Where are these unaccused and innocent prisoners? It was supposed from the mention of the Mediterranean, that they had been sold as slaves on the coast of Barbary; but the Consul had by this time invented a shorter method of getting rid of the sable friends of freedom, and had, no doubt, sent it for the use of "the virtuous" Leclerc, at St. Domingo, as well as of Richepanse, at Guadaloupe. The Mediterranean was possibly a watch-word, by which these monsters understood each other, when they wrote of their drownings at sea.

Of the prisoners in the frigate Mucron, and of the friends of Toussaint, confined in the ships at St. Domingo, the public has heard no more; and certain it is, that soon after this period, the French Generals drowned their prisoners by hundreds and thousands, even in their very roadsteads, and harbours; without trial, without distinction of age or sex, guilt or innocence, without remorse or shame, and almost in the face of day. The only trouble they took was to put out a short way from the shore in the evening, and discharge their human cargoes, so as to be at anchor again before day-break. So near the Island was it done, that the floating bodies of the victims, too numerous for the sharks to devour, continually shocked the eyes of the British and American seamen who were passing near that horrible coast.

If the elder sons of Toussaint had not been murdered, as I suspect they had, in the war, they were probably among the number of these 100 innocents to whom the attachment of their father was fatal; for as I have already observed, all his family were made prisoners, and yet two children only arrived with the mother in France.

Let us now follow the oppressed Hero in his way to that land of slavery and guilt.

He was refused, as far as I am able to collect, the comfort of conversing with his family on the passage. In other respects, at least, he was treated with the utmost rigour; for even the public French accounts disclosed that he was confined constantly in his cabin, and there guarded by soldiers with fixed bayonets.

No sooner had he arrived in the harbour of Brest than he was hurried on shore; and it was now that his fortitude had to sustain its severest trial. Even the fierce and cruel Leclerc had thought it too harsh to separate him from his beloved wife and children; but now he was forced by the merciless Consul to bid them a last adieu. They were detained prisoners on ship-board, while he was carried to a solitary cell in a distant castle in the country.

How truly dreadful to the feeling hearts of Toussaint and his family, must have been this separation! He knew full well, nor could his faithful wife be ignorant, that they were to meet no more in this life.

Till the last trumpet shall sound, that dear face which had beamed affection on him for thirty years, which was now beginning to be furrowed with his own cares, and which he saw then bathed with his own sorrows, must be beheld no more. Those little innocents too, the last fruit of their conjugal love; that orphan daughter of his brave brother*, who perished at his side in the cause of freedom; and those faithful servants, whose tears witness their attachment; all must receive his last sad farewell.

And, ah! in what hands does he leave all these beloved objects! to what a fate are they reserved! He knows his ruffian enemies too well to hope they will be suffered to live. Dear repositories of the confidence of Toussaint; privy to the foul mysteries of his fate, they are doomed not long to survive him. Bitter thought, that their love, and their relation to himself, consigned them to a violent death, and that his presence must no longer sustain them.

Unfortunately we have no cool willing spectator like Coisson to describe this separation—but its affecting circumstances may, in part, be supposed.

Methinks I see the Hero endeavouring to sooth the sufferings of his family, and to hide his own; while the unhappy group surround him in the cabin, and force him to linger with them, the officers of the Consul are calling from the deck loudly for dispatch.

* Paul Louverture, our Hero's brother, who bravely attempted to defend the city of St. Domingo against the invaders, and at first repelled their assault. We hear of him no more after that day: It is probable he joined his brother at La Riviere, and fell in that well-fought field.

At length the ruffians will bear no longer delay, and Toussaint strives gently to disengage himself from the embraces of anguish and affection.

I see the agonized wife clasping his neck with convulsive force ; and the elder boy clinging to his waist, while the other embraces his knee with its little arms, and screams at the approach of the soldiers.

The word is repeatedly given,—the ruffians begin to force them asunder—a general cry arises—Toussaint is borne out of the cabin, and put into a boat that is waiting to receive him.

As they row astern, his eyes catch a last view of his distracted wife, who is borne up by one of her servants. He lifts an imploring eye to heaven, and a tear trickles down his manly cheek. He has almost reached the shore, before the splashing oars, and increasing distance, relieve his ear from the cries of his children.

This pitiless deed being done, the humane Consul's further orders were to convey his victim to prison with as much secrecy as possible ; and his mutes managed so well, that it was for some time a matter of guess and of jarring reports in France, in what place this interesting prisoner was confined. He was conveyed in a close carriage, and under a strong escort of cavalry, to the remote castle of Joux, in the neighbourhood of Mount Jura.

Here he was confined a long time in a way, the strictness of which may be imagined from the darkness which long prevailed as to his fate while multitudes were curious to know it. We may conclude that none but his keepers were permitted to see or converse with him, with the exception only, as appears, of a single Negro attendant, who was as closely confined as his master.

This treatment I admit might not entirely flow from the Consul's cruelty and spite. His policy had doubtless a great share in it ; for bad though France is, it was not convenient that the tale of Toussaint should be told there. From the time of this great man's arrest to that of his death, L  clerc and the Consul took very remarkable care that his voice should not be heard by any body but his gaolers ; and these, I doubt not, were forbidden, on pain of death, to hear any secret that their prisoner might wish to disclose. The same effectual care seems to have been taken to stop the mouths of all his family and friends :—nor can any other motive be found for the persecution of a helpless woman, whose only crime was the glory of being his wife. We may, therefore, reasonably suspect that Toussaint, and those in his confidence, had some dreadful secrets to tell ; though it is no easy matter to guess what could have been revealed to make his oppressors more detestable than they already were, upon the facts they were unable to conceal.

Perhaps the Consul hoped, that while the voice of his victim was stopped, his flimsy and self-contradictory impostures might gain credit in the world, and that he might wash himself from the blood of Toussaint with the ink of his own gazettes.

The afflicted wife and family of our Hero were not imprisoned with less closeness than himself. Curiosity was, no doubt, busy about them, and yet I have been able to obtain no account of them, public or private, from the time of their detention on ship-board at Brest, which was about the 11th of July, to the 11th of September following.

The Paris papers of the latter date have the following paragraph :
 " A corvette from Brest with the wife, two children, a niece, and the servants of Toussaint, arrived on the 3d instant at Bayonne."

It is probable that to this period they continued closely confined in the ship which brought them from the West Indies; but for what end they were removed to Bayonne, or how the tyranny of the Consul afterwards disposed of them, I have not been able to learn. Near twelve months have since elapsed, and had the fate of this interesting family been generally known in France, we should, doubtless, have heard of it in England. Their voice has been hushed, they have disappeared, and, from the character of their oppressor, we may guess at the means.

Toussaint himself, whom we left in the castle of Joux, may be supposed by my readers to have already glutted the Consul's jealousy and vengeance.

There he lay, robbed of power, of greatness, of freedom, of his family and friends, and as far as malice could effect, of his fair fame itself. Denied a trial, debarred from all other means of proving or asserting his innocence, unable either to resist or complain, he was left to pine in solitude and silence, while his enemy was able to rail at and slander him at pleasure, without contradiction or reproof.

What more could the Tyrant desire? Buonaparte's revenge, however, and his spite at freedom, were not yet appeased.

A faithful servant had hitherto been suffered to attend this oppressed Hero, at the expence of sharing his imprisonment; and it was no doubt reported to the Consul that this little indulgence soothed, in some degree, a heart which he was resolved, if possible, to break. This consolation, therefore, was next torn from him—the poor Negro was divided from his beloved master, and sent under a strong guard to a prison at Dijon, where his silence was, no doubt, made for ever secure by some of the Consul's merciful methods.

The little despot, no doubt, expected that these and other severities would speedily save him the shame of cutting off his illustrious victim by a direct assassination.

But Toussaint had consolation and support still remaining, of which tyranny could not deprive him. The God whom he had worshipped continually, was still with him; and though it was not his holy will to send deliverance in this life, the spirit of his servant was strengthened, and kept from impatience and despair.

The Consul's inflexible cruelty, therefore, had further measures to take.

From the castle of Joux, where perhaps Buonaparte had not a cell or a keeper bad enough for his final purpose, the brave Toussaint was removed at the approach of winter to Besançon, and there placed in his last abode; a cold, damp, and gloomy dungeon.

Let my readers imagine the horrors of such a prison to an African; who had arrived, at the age of fifty years, or more, in a climate like that of the West Indies, where warmth and free air are never wanting, not even in gaols, and where the cheerful beams of the sun are only too bright and continual. We know, that with all the warmth which fires and good clothing can give to Negroes in this climate, the stoutest of them suffer severely by the winter.

But it was for these very reasons that the merciless Consul chose for Toussaint his last place of confinement. The floor of the dungeon was actually covered with water*, and we need not doubt that the poor victim was deprived of every means that might help to sustain his declining health during the severity of the winter.

* These particulars the author has learnt from a very respectable and intelligent gentleman who spent some time in France, last winter, and obtained his information from the best authorities that the case would afford.

Now is it not clear, that if this Tyrant, like the Jacobins whom he untruly boasts of having put down, had dispatched our Hero by the guillotine at once, he would have acted with far less cruelty? But he, who butchers and massacres by thousands and ten thousands abroad, would fain make himself out a better man forsooth, than Robespierre, by being able to boast that he does not shed so much blood at home; and he actually seems to take this in the literal sense of the words; so that if he murders men ever so cruelly without opening their veins, he supposes that he may still lay claim to the praise of great humanity.

It is for this reason, no doubt, that he used poison in the hospital in Egypt, and that he stifled and drowned in the sea, so many thousands of the innocent Negroes of Guadaloupe and St. Domingo.

His new method with Toussaint could not fail of final success. The strength however of the sufferer's constitution, added to his patience and religious tranquillity, made the murder a very tedious work. His death was not announced in the French papers till the 27th of April last; so that he held out under all the sufferings of the last winter; and it is doubted whether the Consul was not obliged to have recourse at last to poison or some other violent means. Some people entertain a notion that this great man is still living. If he be, Providence has wonderfully preserved him, and probably for some glorious end; but as the account of his death, shameful as it was to the Consul, was permitted to be published in France, and has not been contradicted there, I fear it is too true that this foul murder is finished; and has added an unsurpassable pitch of guilt and infamy to the other crimes of his oppressor.

Here, then, we must drop the curtain, on the great, the good, the pious, and the generous Toussaint, leaving him to reap the fruits of his virtues in that happier world, "Where the wicked cease from troubling, and where the weary are at rest."

Were an epitaph wanted for this wonderful man, we might find a fair though not a full one, in the words of his murderer—"Called by his talents to the chief command in St. Domingo, he preserved the Island to France during a long and arduous foreign war, in which she could do nothing to support him. He destroyed civil war, put an end to the persecutions of ferocious men, and restored to honour the religion and worship of God, from whom all things come*."

The man of whom all this was said, perished as we have seen, under the merciless oppression of the man who said it. Are you anxious to know how the murderer will perish? you shall know from the same pen, how he himself prophesies on that point. "HAVING BEEN CALLED BY THE ORDER OF HIM FROM WHOM ALL THINGS EMANATE, TO BRING BACK TO THE EARTH, JUSTICE, ORDER, AND EQUALITY, I SHALL HEAR MY LAST KNELL SOUND WITHOUT EMOTION†."
